Damage upon separation

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Question. I have been married for seven years. My wife and I live in the home I own, bought five years before marriage.

However, the home is registered in my name only. My wife contributed nothing to the purchase or enhancement of the value of this home. I also own a large amount of RRSPs and have no debts. My wife has no assets or liabilities. Our marriage may end in separation, I am not certain. The mortgage payments are a bit high and I would prefer to move into a smaller home.

What is my current situation if we were to separate and if not, what should I do to plan for separation down the road to minimize the damage to my property holdings? Before marriage, my home was worth $350,000. Now it is worth more than $550,000.

Answer. Currently if you were to separate, your wife would be entitled to half of the entire value of your matrimonial home, including its pre-marital value. She would also be entitled to half of the increase in the value of your RRSPs (valued as of the date of separation) after tax, since they increased after the date of marriage.

There is nothing you can really do about your RRSPs, unless you foolishly and improperly attempt to transfer them into the names of a third party, like an old and trusted relative or friend.

However, the moment you do so the entire capital amount of the RRSPs becomes calculated as part of your taxable income for the year in which you cashed them.

Moreover, if you transferred them close to the date of separation, say within the year or so, you could be accused of deliberately and fraudulently depleting your assets in order to deprive your wife of her rights to an equalization split. She might then likely recover what you tried to hide from one of your other more exposed assets or from your income over a number of years, plus penalties and interest.

Your matrimonial home is another matter. The law gives her an unfair split of its pre-marital value in your situation. She might want to buy a new house, especially if you offer to do so in joint names.

Since you will not have owned that second home on the date of marriage, you can deduct the full value of the equity in the first home you owned on the date of marriage in the equalization calculation when you separate.

This effectively means that your wife would only benefit from her half-share in the post-marital value of the second or any subsequent matrimonial home. According to your valuations, this means a saving of about $100,000 if you were to separate in the near future.

Sports doctor helps pro hockey players function at a higher level

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

Officially reported injuries may have contributed to the Calgary Flames' early exit from the NHL playoffs when they were beaten by the Chicago Blackhawks in the Western Conference quarter-finals, but according to sports doctor Aubrey Green, there was more to the Flames' defeat than met the eye.

"I think those guys are going to stand up for themselves and they're not going to use injuries as an excuse, but I can tell you that there's a lot of players who are playing injured who aren't reporting it and are battling through," Green said.

A 34-year-old Toronto chiropractor and acupuncturist, Green has built a practice and a reputation over the past several years treating professional hockey and football players in the NHL and the CFL. His patients include the Flames' all-star captain Jarome Iginla, defenceman Dion Phaneuf and forward Todd Bertuzzi.

"Hockey players are strong, tough athletes, and they battle through a lot of adversity and injuries and do the best job they can. But there are guys who wouldn't be competing in the regular season with how banged up they might be," he said.

Green prefers a "drugless approach to health."

Born in Vancouver and raised in Toronto, Green didn't always plan on becoming a sports doctor.

When he was 16, he injured his back playing basketball and as a result got his first close-up look at chiropractic medicine.

"It showed me a hands-on, drugless approach to health. And not to say that I don't believe in the drug approach, too – it's got its place – but for me, I went to see someone to help me out and it opened my eyes up to that profession," Green said.

After attending high school at Forest Hill Collegiate, Green got his bachelor of arts degree from the University of Western Ontario before putting in a year at law school. But when he got accepted to Toronto's Canadian Memorial Chiropractic College, he found what he really wanted to do.

"I just took a year-long leave of absence, but I never went back to law because I enjoyed chiropractic so much," he said.

After earning his chiropractic degree, he went on to take sports medicine and acupuncture courses at Hamilton's McMaster University.

"I think that it's a fair thing to say that it's everybody's goal and dream when they're sitting in class [to] want to work with world-class athletes, but whether that's realistic or not is the question," he said.

Green got his big break when he was referred to treat hockey player Jason Arnott, who is currently the captain of the Nashville Predators. After Green proved that his treatments worked, his reputation spread by word-of-mouth and he started getting calls from more pro athletes.

"Arnott referred guys to me and then over the years guys get traded, they go to different teams, and people hear about me. It's a relatively small world, the hockey world," Green said.

In addition to the training he got at school, Green has developed his own therapies and techniques that have earned him a reputation for effectiveness within the world of professional sports.

"You have to get into the room, but then the second thing is you have to show that what you're doing is result oriented. When [Arnott] was playing for Dallas, he had an injury and he was going to be out for three to four weeks, and through my treatment, he was back on the ice in two days," Green said.

It also doesn't hurt that Green has been able to hit it off on a personal level with the athletes that he treats. Having a closer relationship with a player even makes him a better doctor, he says.

"When you travel with the guys, you develop a relationship. You're spending time with them and there is definitely a rapport, and that increases your working relationship. Part of what you're doing is positive reinforcement to help them get in the right frame of mind with respect to their bodies. The more confidence they have in what they're doing, the more they'll succeed," he said.

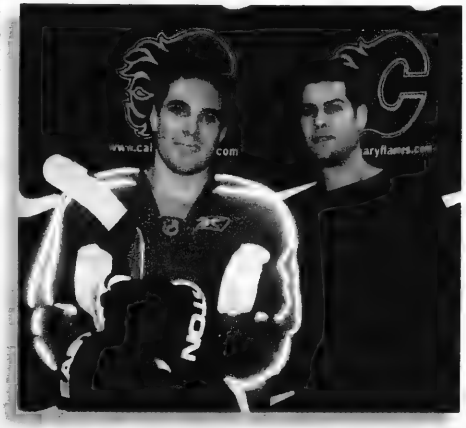
"In the perfect situation, I want the athletes I work with to be healthy and feeling good. And in that case it is performance based, where I'm doing treatment to get them functioning at 110 per cent of their capability, instead of dealing with an injury. So by working with the muscles, the nerves, the joints, you're making them function at a higher level – faster, stronger, more explosive on the ice or in the field," he said.

In addition to his celebrity clients, he works with what he calls "weekend warriors" at his Toronto office, and he's planning to launch a product line – "Dr. Greens" – which he hopes will alert people to sports-related injuries before they become major health concerns.

Ironically, Green's practice has made him give up his own sporting ambitions. Though he used to play basketball competitively, he found that his own injuries were interfering with the quality of care he was able to offer his patients.

Still, he works out and maintains a healthy lifestyle.

"I try to practise what I preach," he said.



The Calgary Flames' Mike Cammalleri has also benefited from Green's treatments.

'We must fight anti-Semitism wherever it is found'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Pope Benedict XVI arrived in Israel from Jordan on Monday morning, on the second leg of a pilgrimage to Middle East holy sites that takes him to Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian territories.

The Pope, whose readmittance of Holocaust-denying Bishop Richard Williamson into the Catholic Church has badly damaged ties with the Jewish world, vowed in his first speech at Ben-Gurion International Airport to fight anti-Semitism, which he deemed "totally unacceptable."

"I take my place in a long line of Christian pilgrims to these shores, a line that stretches back to the earliest centuries of the Church's history and which, I am sure, will keep and continue long into the future," the Pope said during his address on the tarmac.

"I come, like so many others before me, to pray at the holy places, to pray especially for peace – peace in the Holy Land and peace throughout the world."

In his address, the Pope also denounced anti-Semitism and said that humanity must make every effort to avoid a crime on the scale of the one committed in the Holocaust.

"I will have the opportunity to honour the memory of the six million Jewish victims of the Shoah," said the German Pope, who faces criticism for policies toward Jews, including his recent reinstatement of Williamson, who denied the Nazis had killed six million people.

"Sadly, anti-Semitism continues to rear its ugly head in many parts of the world. This is totally unacceptable," the Pope said. "Every effort must be made to combat anti-Semitism wherever it is found, and to promote respect and esteem for the members of every people, tribe, language and nation across the globe."

Pope Benedict also urged the warring parties in the Middle East to strive for peaceful relations.

"I plead with all those responsible to explore every possible avenue in the search for a just resolution of the outstanding difficulties, so that both peoples may live in peace in a homeland of their own, within secure and internationally recognized borders," the Pope said.

Pope Benedict landed in Israel at approximately 11 a.m. on a special Royal Jordanian flight. He was met by Israeli dignitaries, including President Shimon Peres and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

An Israel Defence Forces honour guard greeted the Pope upon his descent onto the tarmac at Ben-Gurion Airport. The Pontiff stood between Netanyahu and Peres as the band played Israel's national anthem Hatikva, the Vatican's anthem and Jerusalem of Gold. After the welcoming ceremony, he was flown by helicopter to Jerusalem.

Upon his arrival in Jerusalem, he was greeted by Mayor Nir Barkat and other dignitaries, at the Mount Scopus landing pad.

Barkat told the Pontiff he would feel at home in the Holy City. "In Jerusalem, the capital of Israel and the Jewish people, we promote pluralism, dialogue and freedom of religion," said Barkat.

In the afternoon, the Pontiff was to meet at the president's residence with Peres and the parents of the captive Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit. A tree-planting ceremony was also scheduled there.

In the late afternoon the Pope was to visit the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum and make a statement after laying a wreath at the memorial for those who perished in the Shoah.

Police seize ancient scroll

Israeli police seized a 2,000-year-old Hebrew scroll from two Palestinians. The men were arrested for trying to illegally sell the valuable antiquity. The Hebrew document is written on papyrus and measures about 6 inches by 6 inches. The document is written in ancient Hebrew script, which is characteristic of the Second Temple period and shortly thereafter, and is primarily known from the Dead Sea Scrolls and inscriptions found on ossuaries and coffins. The document is dated with the sentence "Year 4 to the destruction of Israel." "What we have here is rare historic evidence about the Jewish people in their country from more than 2,000 years ago, during the days following the destruction which sent the people of Israel into exile for a very long time – until the creation of the State of Israel," said Amir Ganor, director of the unit for the prevention of antiquities robbery in the Israel Antiquities Authority. The scroll will undergo laboratory analyses to negate the possibility it's a forgery.

Arab peace plan amended

Arabs states are revising the Saudi peace initiative to make it more palatable to Israel, according to an Arabic-language newspaper. The London-based al-Quds al-Arabi reported that the moderate Arab nations are making the amendments at the request of U.S. President Barack Obama and that some of the changes involve the demand for the right of return for Palestinian refugees. The changes also will set a timetable for normalizing relations between Israel and the Arab countries in the region, if Israel withdraws to pre-1967 borders. The amended plan, being coordinated by Jordan's King Abdullah, will be presented to Obama when he meets Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Washington.

Canadian-born soldier killed in West Bank clash

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Canadian-born Israel Defence Forces soldier was killed last Thursday morning during an operation near Ramallah. The soldier, Sgt. Noam Adin Rechter-Levy, 20, was killed when his weapon discharged while he was scuffling with Palestinians in the town of Bir Zeit, a probe found.

Rechter-Levy was born in Montreal and immigrated to Israel with his family at the age of eight.

The incident began in the early hours of the morning when a clash broke out between a contingent of troops and people in the Palestinian town.

At one point, an officer and a soldier left the main force, apparently in a bid to flank the Palestinians. The pair subsequently encountered more Palestinians, with whom they began to scuffle.

Shortly afterward, a shot was heard and the soldier collapsed, critically wounded. He was later pronounced dead at the scene.

Troops apprehended three Palestinians whom they suspect of participating in the clash.

An investigation will determine whether the Palestinians with whom Rechter-Levy scuffled pointed the barrel at him while the rifle was strapped to his body as they were fighting.

Rechter-Levy was the first IDF casualty in the West Bank in 20 months.

"Noam was full of life and loved by everybody," his brother, Ma'ayan, said. "The smile never fell from his face. A wide heart as his is rarely found.

"Noam possessed a sense of justice that was unique. He was a dedicated and loyal friend who was willing to lend a supporting shoulder and an attentive ear. He always sought happiness and joy and made the most out of every moment he shared with family and friends."

Sgt. Noam Adin Rechter-Levy

Born in Montreal in 1988, Noam was the fourth of five children. He added the name Rechter to his surname to pay homage to his grandmother, whose family perished in the Holocaust.

His family came to Israel some 12 years ago and settled in the town of Mitzpeh Natufa in the Lower Galilee. He attended the elementary school in Kibbutz Lavi and completed his secondary school studies in the Yeshiva High School in Tiberias.

Ma'ayan said his brother was a very active child who was quick to adapt to his surroundings and was curious by nature.

"Even before he learned how to speak, he knew how to ride a bicycle without training wheels," he said. "Noam was an excellent athlete and an exceptional basketball player. He established a basketball club for the children in the town, and they loved him, admired him and saw him as a role model."

Noam underwent training as a medic. Last month, he was promoted to the position of battalion medic. "During an operation a few weeks ago he performed CPR on a terrorist who had been seriously injured."

Canada pledged nearly $4 million in aid to Gaza

Speaking to The CJN last Friday from his home in Israel, Noam indicated the ongoing fight to reclaim his son was exacting a toll.

"I'm not so well," he said, adding "It's hard."

He said while he appreciates the sentiment behind the new initiative, it was not his idea and said it may be a waste of energy by U.S. and western politicians.

The Schalit petition comes as an outgrowth of calls by two Democratic members of the U.S. Congress, who last week called for the conditions to be placed on the promised U.S. aid to Gaza.

In a letter to the chairman and ranking member of the House of Representatives appropriations committee, representatives Shelley Berkley (D-Nev.) and Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.) said that it's "essential that we not simply write a 'blank cheque' for the Gaza-based Palestinians to continue" their missile attacks on Israel.

U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton has said that none of the $300 million in aid – part of an overall $900-million aid package for the Palestinians – will go to Hamas. The Gaza assistance is designated to meet humanitarian needs following the Israeli military operation in December and January.

Noam Schalit, who visited Washington two weeks ago and met with members of the U.S. Congress and other politicians, said he did so with the hope that the new Obama administration's policies and outlook on the Middle East may now provide a better "window of opportunity" to get his son back.

He said he asked U.S. officials to make his son's situation part of their policy in the Middle East. But the linkage of foreign monetary aid to his son's release was not part of his agenda.

"There are people who take [my cause] and use it to help. But it was not from me. In Washington, I tried to convey the message that U.S. money won't be any good, because Israel won't transfer construction [payments] to Gaza unless the swap deal for Gilad will be carried out," Noam said.

He added: "I tried to [explain] that the crisis of Gilad is a bottleneck [for negotiations with Gaza and the West], and if the bottleneck isn't opened, nothing can happen."

Earlier this year, Canada pledged nearly $4 million in aid to Gaza to be administered by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA), which will split the funds between the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East and the International Committee of the Red Cross.

At the time, CIDA added that none of the funding would go to Hamas, which Ottawa considers a terrorist organization, but the agency said it was ready to inject more financial support, if necessary, as the humanitarian situation in Gaza develops.

Dimitri Soudas, press secretary to Prime Minister Stephen Harper, told The CJN last Friday that Canada had, as yet, "not provided reconstruction aid to Gaza" citing concerns about the aid falling into Hamas' hands.

Soudas said the government "condemns" Hamas' kidnapping of Schalit and has "repeatedly called for [his] immediate release… so that he can return to loved ones."

He said he didn't know whether Harper had heard about or was considering the initiative to tie aid to Gaza to Schalit's release.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, said that while such an effort might seem useful, there is an "inherent flaw" in its logic and his organization won't ask Ottawa to adopt the idea.

"The Canadian government has withdrawn from funding projects that have any connection to Hamas. Therefore, there is no money to 'condition' to Schalit's release," Fogel told The CJN.

He added: "Even if one were to make such a demand of the [Palestinian Authority] – i.e., no funding unless they get Hamas to release Schalit – it would get no traction, since the PA itself has dysfunctional relations with Hamas. So, while at first blush it appears an attractive approach, in practice, at least as it relates to Canada, the suggestion is not viable."

Noam Schalit said he had not yet met with the new Israeli government headed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, but he said he was slated to meet with Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak on May 13.

"I'm waiting for [Netanyahu] to learn all the details from the former administration… to consider his policy and attitude to this crisis. Now, I have hope. But I don't want to develop high expectations. But [with a] new administration, sure there may be new windows of opportunity," Noam said.

On Monday, Israeli President Shimon Peres invited the elder Schalit to meet with Pope Benedict XVI at Peres' residence as part of the pontiff's tour of the Holy Land.

"The office of the president attaches great importance to the meeting between the Pope and the Schalit family, as the Pope represents over one billion Catholic believers worldwide… and his assistance can be a great asset in the struggle to bring Gilad home," read a statement from Peres' office.

Asked what part Canada might play in helping return Gilad home, Noam Schalit said he was unaware of Canadian policy on the matter and that he was focusing all his efforts on speaking with only "the major players" in the Middle East.

He didn't rule out a potential visit to Canada.

"I was invited [to visit Canada] by the Jewish community in Toronto and Montreal but couldn't visit due to [a busy] schedule. But maybe if I see it's somewhere I can benefit, I'll consider [it]," he said, sounding weary.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

At first glance, the large black and white portraits hanging in the gallery appear to be a collection of vintage photographs of eastern European Jews from the late 19th to the mid-20th century.

Among the photographs, you see a glowing bride and her tentative groom, a sextet of smiling klezmer musicians, and a man with a flowing beard who resembles Tevye from Fiddler on the Roof.

Upon closer examination, however, there is one striking element connecting these photographs. The subjects all have the same face. Indeed, this exhibit showcases self-portraits of Toronto- based photographer Rafael Goldchain.

Through the use of makeup, props and computer manipulation, Goldchain appears as various members of his real and fictional extended family. The show, I Am My Family, runs until May 30 at the O'Born Contemporary gallery, 710 Yonge St., as part of Contact, Toronto's annual photography festival.

These photographs are among a larger body of works from Goldchain's recently published book of self-portraiture, I Am My Family: Photographic Memories and Fictions (Princeton Architectural Press).

The portraits, which Goldchain, calls "post memory," reflect his attempt to insert himself into his own family history, which has many gaps. "I use self-portraiture to create visual representations of identity in relationship to history and culture"

Goldchain's family originated in Poland, but they're now scattered throughout many Latin American countries. He grew up in Chile. In 1975, he came to Canada to study photography at Ryerson University after completing a science degree at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In addition to his freelance work, Goldchain is program co-ordinator of applied photography at Sheridan College. His self-portraits are in the permanent collection of the Canadian Museum of Contemporary Photography, and they have been travelling across the country since 2007 in Persona, a show produced by the museum.

Goldchain notes that the dispersion of his family following World War I and their decimation in the Holocaust is a history typical of many Jewish families.

He laments that his effort to "create the allusion of wholeness highlights the losses and holes in remembered history."

Goldchain's solution was to fill in the holes with patently fictionalized characters. "In the absence of family material, they are created characters based on research of genealogy and published photographic collections," he says.

For example, the klezmer musicians in the wedding picture are a fictional band. They are given the names of people whom Goldchain traced through his genealogical history. On his father's side, he is related to a number of families with surnames that include Goldstein, Goldszayn, Goldszajn and Goldschain, while his mother's side encompasses the Rubinsteins and Krongolds.

Project brought him closer to family history

However, other portraits represent real relatives, whom Goldchain discovered through archival material – a scant collection of old photographs and family stories. A portrait of an elderly woman with an emaciated face is of Pesia Krongold, Goldchain's mother's great-grandmother. "I based the portrait on old photographs of period dress."

A 1999 self-portrait depicting this grandfather was the impetus for a thesis project of 13 self-portraits, for a master of fine arts degree, which Goldchain completed at York University in 2000.

Some of the pictures were featured in the magazine Guilt and Pleasure in 2006 and were seen by Michael Murphy, an American book agent. He approached Goldchain about finding a publisher for a book of self-portraits.

In March of 2007, a publisher signed on with a request for 55 portraits, recalls Goldchain. "I only had 30 at the time."

He says he scrambled to meet a six-month deadline. "This was a team effort. Each picture takes five people. I needed two photography assistants and all types of makeup and hair artists."

Goldchain says the birth of his son – Michael is now 16 – was one of the catalysts for doing the familial self-portraits. "Becoming a father, I needed to feel like I was part of a long chain. I could not get the chain to come together, so I created the illusion of links.

"The project has brought me closer to a larger family history… I wanted to pass on to my son an awareness of a larger family."

An interview with the author of Eva's Threepenny Theatre

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

Eva's Threepenny Theatre, Ottawa-based Andrew Steinmetz's "fiction about memoir," stars his great-aunt Eva, who acted in the 1928 debut of Bertolt Brecht's Threepenny Opera.

Both Eva's dynamic presence and her Brechtian training influenced her nephew's writing. "The overall structure of the book is Brechtian, with its multiple narrators and tones, but the content of each piece within the whole is emotionally driven," Steinmetz said.

Steinmetz: She was no WASP, let's put it that way. Direct, irreverent, packed with real and put-on emotions, her humour came from the extravagant positions she would take. Her theatre training and love of exaggeration made sure she was the focus of attention. I got to know her first when I was 12 and she was in her 60s. She moved into our [Eastern Townships] summer house with at least five dogs. My Swedish grandparents were already living there. They had a whippet – we had two dogs and a cat. On weekends, it was mayhem. I loved that atmosphere.

Eva never stopped telling stories. I picked up on her European sensibility – apparent in her tastes and habits: goose fat, Russian rye, garlic, wine, cigarettes. I didn't grow up feeling very Canadian. Canadians ate hot dogs, we didn't. Whatever Eva was, wherever she came from, I liked that place. I felt comfortable dreaming about it.

C.J.N.: Your first chapter showcases Eva and her pet monkey. Did you deliberately set the tone with this story about a rebellious, caged creature?

Steinmetz: Yes, the story is like Genesis, the founding myth for how Eva will speak in the rest of the novel. It was her showpiece, the first story she told me when I asked her about Brecht. For years I could recite it forward or backwards. I was fluent. I repeat many sentences from this story in different contexts, to show how different voices mouthing the same words strike different chords in the reader. It's also important for its rebellious nature and for setting Eva up as an outsider who loves outsiders. At the end, there is the identification between Eva and her monkey, and Germany and the Jews. When she says, "Everybody knew, and everybody did nothing," she is not talking about Bimbo. She is talking about ordinary German citizens and concentration camps.

C.J.N.: What about Eva and Brecht's Mother Courage?

Steinmetz: Initially, in the book, Eva makes the identification, ironically, to say she has no courage to be a mother to her own child. But Brecht's Mother Courage is complex, ravaged by war, yet also a parasite, fighting for survival by selling her wares to soldiers. She's in a desperate position. Eva told me about Berliners who in 1946-47 made makeshift wagons out of garbage, string, bits of wood and bicycles and used these to transport their "stuff" from place to place. Mother Courage is essentially homeless. So, too, was Eva, a refugee, displaced, restless. But they weren't without guile. Necessity is the mother of invention. Perhaps for Eva necessity was her true mother, the only one she ever had.

Steinmetz: In the end, they became abstractions to me and abstractions are easier to wrestle with than real people. In the book I say Eva was all verb, pure becoming, while HH was this solid noun of pure being. She could improvise, she was flexible – therefore she got through the difficult years. He was inflexible – therefore deformed by the oncoming storm. I had a loving relationship with HH. I have shaped him here and taken away his many good elements. I inherited some of his poems, in German, and translated them [using a dictionary]. He wrote like a good German, about nature and trees and flowers and the sunrise, but also about the pain and trauma of human relationships.

Every morning he went for a walk in the woods near his house outside Winston-Salem. He took his chickens with him. They would walk by his side through the forest. I have learned a lot, thinking about HH and Eva, their lives, the choices they made. After years reading about their times, staring at photographs, listening to them talk and to others talk about them, still, I am aware that I don't really know them.

C.J.N.: What about Rudolf, HH's friend who, as a Nazi, rescues the stranded Eva in return for favours?

Steinmetz: However extravagant, almost all her stories checked out, factually. Eva rarely used a euphemism. When she did, I knew she was hiding something painful. She was blackmailed in Vienna, sexually – she did not call it rape – and that's how she got to Switzerland. She would not give details. The Nazi in question was not this Rudolf. The reality is much worse.

C.J.N.: Why is this family so often described as being on stage? Were the Steinmetz clan –"our Jewish origins," as HH writes, the words crossed out – already playing roles, as assimilated Jews?

Steinmetz: Every family is its own distinct society, even happy families… My grandfather and Eva would probably never have said they were part Jewish, to them that was Nazi math. HH was punished for every identity – bourgeois, part-Jew, German – so he became a rabid atheist and recluse. He did not want to play a role, period. As a writer I can relate to that; I am fond of Keats' idea of negative capability; the writer erases himself to become the other. I have pushed that theory pretty far, personally and artistically… Writing the book, I did ask myself: Is this [struggle with identity] the consequence of having crossed out Jewish origins – of having relinquished my religious and cultural identity?

C.J.N.: How did writing the book affect you artistically?

Steinmetz: Artistically, the book pushed me to my limit. For me, every sentence is an experiment. I wrote sections in first person, third person, second person, using a different voice for sections of historical fiction and two others for oral storytelling. It took me over 14 years. For many of those years, I hung on to the manuscript like you might an overturned boat.

Filmmaker Yoav Shamir

Israeli documentary filmmaker examines anti-Semitism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli documentary filmmaker Yoav Shamir was drawn to the oldest hatred, anti-Semitism, precisely because he had never personally experienced it.

"We live in a Jewish place, and anti-Semitism is not part of our lives," said Shamir, whose film, Defamation, was screened at the recent Hot Docs festival in Toronto. "Yet anti-Semitism makes headlines and we read about it constantly. So, yes, I was curious."

In an interview, Shamir, 38, said that since he knew little about anti-Semitism when he started his project, he approached Abe Foxman, the director of the Anti-Defamation League, which is headquartered in New York City.

"They're the biggest organization in the world fighting anti-Semitism. So they seemed like a logical choice."

According to Shamir, Foxman, a Holocaust survivor, liked the film. "He thought it was fair. They're OK with it."

As he talks, he professes not to understand the meaning of the phrase anti-Semitism, scoffs at the thought that Jews are persecuted and claims that they control the world.

"He hadn't met too many Jews in his life," said Shamir by way of explaining the driver's ignorance and prejudice.

As Defamation picks up a head of steam, Shamir's cynical grandmother mischievously spouts anti-Semitic notions, Israeli students visiting Poland detect whiffs of anti-Semitism, an Israeli newspaper editor maintains that all European nations are anti-Semitic, and a young African-American man living in a chassidic enclave in New York City portrays The Protocols of the Elders of Zion as a blueprint of the truth.

A Russian Jew downplays the persistence of anti-Semitism. A rabbi in Kiev claims that only secular Jews are concerned by anti-Semitism. The controversial anti-Zionist American academic, Norman Finkelstein, observes that Jews in the United States need not worry about the "new anti-Semitism."

As the film winds down, an American Jew on an Anti-Defamation League information trip in Europe says he regards Israel as an "insurance policy," while a Jewish academic says that Israel's policies toward the Palestinians should be a source of concern for Jews in Israel and everywhere else.

Shamir, whose 2003 film Checkpoint dealt critically with Israel's system of checkpoints in the West Bank, said he did not make Defamation with the intention of probing anti-Semitism's origins or explaining its appeal.

"That would be the subject of another film," noted Shamir, who lives in Tel Aviv.

He added, "Anti-Semitism concerns me as much as racism and homophobia."

What also worries him is the prevalence of racism in Israel. "It's a very serious problem. It's almost impossible for an Israeli Arab to rent an apartment in Tel Aviv."

Shamir believes that Israel has "a very complicated and tricky" relationship with Jews in the Diaspora. When Israel's policies are denounced, Jews living outside Israel may well be targeted, he suggested.

Although he finds Finkelstein interesting, he describes him as "a traumatized, wounded man who expresses his ideas in an extreme way."

In conclusion, Shamir thinks that Jews should live in the present, look to the future and shake off their preoccupation with the past.

The lesson of the Holocaust is that Israel needs to be strong. "But we have no right to abuse other people," he said in an oblique reference to Israeli Arabs and the Palestinians.

SHOLEM ASCH PLAY GOD OF VENGEANCE AT HOLY BLOSSOM TEMPLE

Holy Blossom Temple Stagecraft Company is preparing to stage an English version of Yiddish playwright Sholem Asch's controversial God of Vengeance.

Controversial in its day, the 1907 play takes place in a Polish brothel run by Yankel Chapchovich. Attempting to gain respectability within the Jewish community, Yankel purchases a sefer Torah and offers it as a dowry for his daughter, Rivkele, hoping she will marry a young rabbinic scholar. Tragedy ensues when Rivkele undermines her father's dreams and hopes.

"The play ranges across many social issues that are still present within our own community, as well as mainstream society," said director Eric Kirsh.

The cast consists of Esther Arbeid, Ron Boyd, Susanne Egier, Heather Finestone, David Fournier, Nora Freund, Anna Grosman, Harry Hochman, Ellen Karabanow, Judy Kent, Michael Ryval and Ivana Stojanovic. $18, $12. Holy Blossom Temple, 1950 Bathurst St. Thursday, June 4 and Saturday, June 6 at 8 p.m., and Sunday, June 7, 2 p.m. 416-789-3291, ext. 511

Eizenman looks to score on and off the ice

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Fans of Canadian Jewish hockey talent will be familiar with the name Oren Eizenman.

The Toronto native is a standout forward with Israel's national hockey program and last year received favourable appraisal from NHL scouts, when he was invited to the Vancouver Canucks' training camp before the start of the 2008-2009 season.

While he didn't make the big league this year – Eizenman, 24, was hobbled with a number of minor injuries that kept him from peak performance throughout the regular season, he said – his time playing for the Canucks' farm team, the AHL's Manitoba Moose, was productive.

In mid-season, Eizenman was traded to the Milwaukee Admirals – the Nashville Predators' AHL affiliate – and late last month, he helped the team sweep its semi-final playoff series against the Rockford Ice Hogs.

Known more for his scoring and playmaking, Milwaukee's coaching staff has asked him to become a grittier player with the Admirals.

Eizenman told The CJN it's a part he's happy to play.

"It's exciting," he said. "My game continues to become more well-rounded. In the past couple of months, I've focused more on the defensive aspects of my game, which has led to my coach being comfortable with me killing a lot of penalties, as well as shutting down the other team's top lines. I think this year has made me a much more versatile player."

The Admirals continued their quest for the AHL's Calder Cup with their West Division Final series against the Houston Aeros late last month.

While he's intent on continuing his quest to break into the NHL next year, Eizenman's off-season will prove challenging this year as well.

In addition to his hockey career, Eizenman will start his own business this summer with the launch of a hockey camp in Toronto geared toward helping kids aged five to 13 improve their game and learn from professionals.

Called the Young Stars Hockey Camp, Eizenman, along with friend and partner, Brandon Luft, are offering two week-long sessions of intense hockey skills training from Aug. 10 to Aug. 21 to "strengthen the Jewish community through a Canadian pastime," according to the camp's motto.

Luft said the hockey camp is a "50/50" partnership with the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's Centre Camp and is also co-sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the United Way.

Sessions will take place at York University's Ice Gardens hockey facility, and Eizenman said he's working on bringing in some "special" instructors, hinting that he may be able to coax some of his NHL friends and colleagues to give some hockey lessons to campers.

Eizenman said he'll be the head instructor at the camp – where campers will get three hours of on-ice instruction per day – and he's eager to impart his experience and knowledge to the kids.

"I've wanted to do this for awhile. I wanted to give back to a community that has given me so much," he said.

"I felt there was a void for Toronto kids who wanted to get better in hockey. They should have the highest level of training possible. When you're young, you have the potential to develop skills. With kids, you really see huge improvements [over time]."

This is the second time Eizenman will run a hockey camp for youngsters. He had a brief turn as an instructor at another camp in upstate New York three years ago while playing for the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute Engineers in NCAA Division I hockey.

"I've been playing hockey for a long time at a really high level, and this is an opportunity to pass on all the things I've been fortunate enough to learn from all the great coaches I've had over the years," Eizenman said of his new camp.

"I hope this experience can help some of the kids realize their dreams as I did," he said. "Hockey is the coolest job in the world, if you ask me. If I can help just one kid get there, I'd be very happy."

Eizenman added that he hopes his camp will blossom into a sort of farm system for Israel's national hockey program, and that discussions are underway with Israeli hockey officials to partner with the camp in the coming years.

Boxer who survived Auschwitz by fighting dies

JTA

JERUSALEM—Salamo Arouch, a Greek-Jewish boxer who survived Auschwitz by fighting fellow prisoners, has died.

Arouch died in a nursing home in Israel on April 26. He was 86.

Arouch served as a consultant on the 1989 film Triumph of the Spirit about his win-or-die fights staged by the Nazis. It was the first major movie to be filmed on location at the Polish death camp.

He had been a boxing star in his hometown of Salonika before being deported in 1943 to the death camp. Arouch has said he won 208 fights and had two draws during his time in the camp. Each fight continued until one of the competitors died either from the fight or by the gun of a Nazi soldier.

In 1945 he was transferred to Bergen-Belsen until he was liberated by Allied forces.

In Israel, Arouch was known as Shlomo. He boxed there as an amateur after fighting in Israel's War of Independence, then opened a shipping and moving business in Tel Aviv.

Solving Iran

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

Question: What is the endgame vis-á-vis Iran's nukes?

Answer No. 1: The Israeli government, based on evidence gathered by the Israel Defence Forces, decides that Iran is building nuclear bombs with the intention of using them against Israel. The air force attacks Iranian nuclear sites. Israel either completely neutralizes Iran's nuclear capabilities or risks a nuclear counterattack.

Answer No. 2: The United States, Europe and perhaps some of the more moderate Arab states negotiate peace with Iran. The Iranians pledge to not build nuclear bombs (or if they have already built bombs, to destroy them) in exchange for foreign aid and acceptance by the West.

Answer No. 3: As it turns out, Iran doesn't have the capacity, know-how or will to build nuclear weapons. President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's blustering aside, its nuclear forays are, in fact, purely designed to provide cheaper electricity.

The true answer, I suspect, includes elements of all of the above. Iran, most probably, has a serious interest in building nuclear weapons, and as such, the Israelis must consider the risk of an attack and how to destroy or disrupt Iran's nuclear development. At the same time, Iran may be willing to negotiate a settlement that would see its nuclear program effectively become a non-threat to Israel. And there is also the possibility that Iran simply can't build a nuke – at least not right now.

On the surface, the Iran situation seems rather simple: a country that supports radical Islamists appears to be building nuclear weapons. The only logical reason it would be involved in such a project, seemingly, is to launch them at Israel, the country that its president has said he'd like to see wiped off the map.

But the story is much, much more complicated.

First and foremost, let's remember that Iran does not yet have any nuclear bombs, so all scenarios remain, for now, hypothetical. For years now, reports have suggested that the country is closing in on producing a nuke – Tehran may be three years away, five years away, two months away, etc.

Nobody seems to know exactly when Iran will be able to build a useable weapon. Iranian leaders, smartly, have kept their cards close to their chests. We have built up our own fear of what they might do with a nuclear bomb.

But Israel isn't Iran's only enemy in the region. In fact, Israel may not even be Iran's most likely target. Most of us forget that while Tehran is engaged in a war of words with the West and Israel, it's fighting an actual war against other Muslims. The internecine fighting between Shia-dominated Iran and Sunni-dominated Iraq and Saudi Arabia shows no signs of ending soon.

Indeed, Shia-Sunni fighting is likely to heat up, especially when the United States begins to remove its soldiers from Iraq. The Iranians are already working hard to destabilize Iraq, and they will probably ramp up those efforts when the Americans leave. This could quite possibly lead Saudi Arabia to interject, which would in turn increase the chances of a regional, Muslim-versus-Muslim war. In such a scenario, there's no reason to think Tehran wouldn't be willing to use nuclear weapons on Iraq or Saudi Arabia.

Don't misunderstand: the Iranian nuclear program still poses a threat to Israel. We're talking about a country run by Islamists with a known history of supporting anti-Israel terror groups. If Iran was to acquire nuclear capability, it would pose a serious danger to Israel, and Israel might be forced to act.

But, let's not forget that things are not so straightforward. Iran does not yet have nukes, so we have time to consider strategies that can be used if/when Iran goes nuclear. And, more importantly, a nuclear Iran doesn't necessarily mean a nuclear war for Israel. Time is – still – on our side.

Let's use the opportunity to explore all possible roads away from a Middle East war of destruction.

CREAM OF PARSNIP SOUP

2 tsp butter
1/4 c diced onion
5 c vegetable stock
Pinch pepper
3/4 tsp white balsamic vinegar
9 small peeled parsnips, chopped
3 diced shallots
3/4 cup white wine
3/4 tsp salt
3/4 c half-and-half

In large pot over medium-low heat, melt butter. Add shallots and onion; sauté, stirring about 4 min. Add wine, stir well, and bring to boil. Reduce heat to medium-low and simmer until wine is reduced by half, about 10 min. Add parsnips, stock, vinegar, salt, and pepper and bring to boil. Reduce heat and simmer gently, uncovered, until parsnips are completely tender, about 45 min. Remove pan from heat and use immersion blender to purée soup or cool slightly and purée in batches in food processor, transferring purée to clean saucepan. Whisk in half-and-half. Reheat when ready to serve.

WORKMEN'S CIRCLE PERETZ SCHOOLS

Where lava once flowed

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Communities mature in different ways over time. Changes occur because of various factors. Anti-Semitism is one of them.

The Toronto Jewish community has developed dramatically in numbers and wealth since the 1940s. There was a huge population increase in the 1980s, when many Israelis chose life on Bathurst Street, as opposed to Dizengoff Street in Tel Aviv.

Around that time, the gates of Russia opened, which allowed for an exodus en masse of Soviet Jews. Thirty-thousand Russians and 40,000 Israelis made Toronto their home.

According to the United Jewish Community website (www.ujc.org), we are the ninth-largest Diaspora Jewish community and "in nearly one generation, Toronto's Jewish community has doubled in size to almost 200,000 people."

Aggressive fundraising has set the tone for the changes in Toronto over the last few decades. The wealth and generosity of our mmunity members has helped Jews who t afford tuition to send their children to day school. Our community has also helped the impoverished with supplementary assistance. This approach – fundraising as the core of our growth – has produced some wonderful results, but it has resulted in an environment in which "the ask" became the prime motivator behind our activities and growth, and it allowed our community's soul to lag.

Our day school graduates, encouraged to make the marks for the bucks, mostly lost interest in Judaism as a thought process and a way of life, and Israel sometimes became a funky place to visit versus an existential commitment. While our community focused on securing the next "gift," our children heard our language and began to show a leviathan sense of entitlement. Jewish university students on campus seemed to turn away from embracing our Jewish homeland. Recently, for example, many have volunteered for short and simple programs with little to no responsibility for the participant.

Something was terribly wrong. We were raising lots of money and building buildings, but our souls were being left out of the equation.

Well, guess who's back – anti-Semitism – and all is changing again. Slowly but surely, the Jews of Toronto are waking up to the reality that fortunes raised – even those invested in Holocaust education – have done little to raise our Jewish consciousness or to decrease the numbers of irascible Jew-haters. Our soulfulness is returning as the epithets hurled at us are getting louder and nastier and it becomes impossible for us to close our eyes to the fact that during the war in Gaza, Jewish students were trapped in their campus offices by a virulently anti-Israel and anti-Semitic group.

Anti-Semitism once again looms over us like the sword of Damocles, and we are coming to life. The situation has ignited our spirit. While it is sad that a community growth spurt has been ignited by the hate directed at us, positive developments are happening – or as I like to say: "Where lava once flowed, flowers now grow."

One of the positive developments is the establishment of an organization by Marcel Cohen, 40, called Your Outreach Network of the Arts (YONA), described by this newspaper as "an organization that aims to bring people of diverse religious and cultural backgrounds – particularly Jews, Muslims and Christians – together in non-partisan environments."

Another positive development is the launch of Doctors Against Racism and Anti-Semitism (DARA) by Dr. Michael Bloom, of the department of anesthesia at the William Osler Health Centre. DARA is a grassroots organization for doctors interested in fighting anti-Semitism, particularly in medical literature, academia and on campus. Well done, Michael!

I look forward to the seasons of growth as they unfold and a time when anti-Semitism and all hatred ceases, and we realize that community-wide involvement in the richness of Judaism can be motivated by an unstoppable pursuit of truth and the motivation to be Godly in nature.

Building homes for others – satisfying at any age

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Often referred to as as snowbirds, many seniors from the cold north relocate to warmer climates for the severe winter months.

Since I no longer play golf or tennis or spend much time sitting around the pool, this winter I looked for an activity that would both stimulate me and contribute something to the community.

I have been a volunteer all of my adult life. Most volunteer positions require an ongoing commitment, however, and since I would be south for only a few months, the choices were limited.

How fortunate I was to be acquainted with two men living in the same Hallandale condominium: Mel Katzman, 81, a semi-retired optometrist from Toronto, and Irving Burnstein, 82, a retired Montreal businessman formerly in the steel business.

Both were volunteers for Habitat for Humanity.

I was aware of Habitat for Humanity but had not previously been involved with it. It's an international, non-profit organization dedicated to eradicating substandard housing by building simple, decent, affordable homes in partnership with low-income families in need. The owners of Habitat homes must have a strong commitment to the program. Families who are unable to qualify for conventional financing and are willing to work hard to improve their lives and the lives of their children are selected to participate in the program.

The selection is based on need, willingness to partner by contributing 500 hours of sweat equity and by attending homebuyer educational workshops. Families must also be able to repay a no-profit, zero-interest mortgage on a monthly basis.

Since I enjoy working and repairing things in my home, often with the help of "do-it-yourself" manuals, I asked Mel and Irving if I could join them in their volunteer work.

To the surprise of my family and friends, twice a week throughout the winter months this year, I went to a building site in Ft. Lauderdale where 14 Habitat houses are being constructed.

I'm sure that the site supervisor was skeptical when I arrived on my first day – a 77-year-old Jewish great-grandmother who was going to tackle the physically taxing activities of construction.

That first day, I was assigned to painting the outside of a house along with several other senior volunteers, some from Canada and some retired and living in Florida. On the building site, there were also younger volunteers active inside and outside of other homes.

I was privileged to work along with Irv, who has volunteered with Habitat since 1995 and participates in the building as well as acting as a house assistant who directs and teaches volunteers, and Mel, who has volunteered for three years and also serves as a teaching assistant from time to time.

They and others taught me a multitude of construction procedures – proper ways to take measurements, how to handle power equipment, safety procedures and a number of other building skills.

As the weeks rolled by, my two days a week at the Habitat site gave me enormous satisfaction.

On one occasion, a woman and her four children stopped at the house that would be hers, and the joy on her face and that of her children meant more than any thank you.

"I've always been taught and believe that if you take something out of a community, you must put something back in," Mel says. "I hope that I can physically continue to give my time to such a worthy project."

When I was at the construction site for my last day of work before returning to Toronto, I said goodbye to my co-volunteers. The site supervisor presented me with a Habitat for Humanity shirt and a hat and said he hoped that I would come back to volunteer next year.

Alevai – I hope so, too.

Hiring a designer can save you money

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

When redesigning your home, doing it yourself may seem like a good way to cut back on expenses. Brian Murphy, an award-winning designer with more than 30 years experience, says, however, that in the long run, hiring a designer will actually save you time – and money.

"You can save yourself money in the fact that after you've done something, [you won't] realize it's not good and have to change it, or buy something twice," he said.

"[Designers] can stop you from making mistakes."

Murphy, with his Toronto-based company Brian Murphy Design & Associates Inc., specializes in modern design. Their unique and artistic approach to shapes and colours stems from Murphy's art school education and background in landscape and interior plant design.

Trends for 2009 include a lot of glass, Murphy said. Glass in kitchens, as room dividers and on coffee tables. Glass stones are making an appearance with another trend – the modern gas fireplace, which uses a line of fire instead of the old method of attempting to recreate a real fireplace, logs and all.

Clean lines and modern design is also a big trend, even among Murphy's clients who previously favoured a more traditional look.

"A few years ago, it was very difficult to convince somebody to do a modern interior, but now I have clients who have been traditional for years who are now interested in doing modern."

Murphy has noticed people are being more careful with their money these days, either scaling back their design projects or doing one room at a time. He said, however, that great design does not have to come with a giant price tag.

"I visited with someone [recently] who was teaching Indian cooking classes. They had a very basic little apartment, but what they'd done was carefully organized the colours in the space so they were all very nicely co-ordinated, and the few items they did have in the house – none of them were expensive – were set up in such a way so that they weren't cluttered. It was a very clean, neat and airy space."

Another advantage of utilizing the services of a designer is that they often come up with ideas to bring new life to a home.

Studio creates beautiful environmentally friendly living spaces

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

bsq. Landscape Design Studio Inc. (416-723-1959, www.bsqdesign.com) is a company dedicated to creating livable spaces. From the landscaped gardens on your property to renovated rooms in the house or a 10 x 20-foot shipping container converted to an office, all spaces created by the studio reflect the fact that owners Rob Boltman and Alex Bartlett are trained in design, construction, colour and design theory.

bsq.'s goal is to complement the home in a way that seems natural and almost effortless; to create gardens that look as though they have always been there and are appropriate for the community.

Boltman emphasizes that their work is not seasonal, and their outdoor work requires year-round consideration. For example, they take into account what plants will look like without their leaves so that the gardens do not suffer when the temperature changes. They factor in heights and screening, and always design first and build later.

Being eco-friendly is also an important aspect of bsq.'s planning. "We like to do as much environmentally friendly as possible," Boltman stresses, and they use recycled elements whenever feasible.

The company most recently received the IDS 09 Silver Award at the Interior Design Show for best booth design 200 square feet to 400 square feet for "10 x 20," a standard shipping container the company turned into an office.

"We took a project and applied it to our business," Boltman says. "We try to be green and make people think, which is our goal as designers in general."

The container incorporates solar power panels, a green roof, a rooftop deck and recycled materials. Boltman refers to 10 x 20 as their "school project" and looks forward to seeing it move to its permanent resting place on Matilda Street overlooking the Don Valley Parkway at Queen Street.

bsq. has also been the recipient of Canada Blooms' Environmental Award and the Ontario Association of Landscape Architects' certificate of merit for excellence in design in landscape architecture.

Boltman is proud that they are receiving all the accolades and recognition for being environmentally friendly; however, in the end, he wants everyone to remember that his company also creates really lovely gardens.

The CJN asked local seniors residences about the simple things that make them special. The following are some of the replies we received.

Margaret Darte, one of Hazelton Place's longstanding residents, is 90 per cent blind and her walker is jokingly labelled "Virtually Blind," but Margaret has ears like a hawk and a heart as big as an elephant's. Without our requesting it and with her instinctive intuition, she gently soothes queries by my many tour visitors or calms upset residents.

Her history has given her the strength and character so appreciated by so many. Having lost a daughter who was tragically killed, she helped develop the Bereaved Families group and returned to school for her master's degree at age 55.

Our staff and residents at Hazelton appreciate all of our residents, but Margaret Darte is a resident who warms our hearts on a daily basis.

Our residents enjoy the music, food and dance that commemorate the special days and revive the memories of the happy occasion.

To help us celebrate, family, relatives and friends always participate. In addition, traditional foods accompany every Jewish holiday.

This year, Yom Ha'atzmaut was celebrated with an Israeli lunch that included shish kebab, Israeli salad, hummus and techinah. The music was lively and the flags were waving.

What makes life at L'Chaim Retirement Home so special is that you don't have to look for heartwarming events – they find you, every day. This is particularly true on Shabbat. I can't tell you how many times children have come to pick up their parents and the parents don't want to go. They don't want to miss Shabbat dinner here!

There is a synagogue in the building, where the full range of Jewish life takes place during the year. The food in the kitchen is kosher and very tasty. I study with the rabbi once a week.

There is also rehab and physiotherapy, and a talk group run by a psychiatrist.

Movies are shown every week, and activities offered include bingo, tai chi, art therapy and special events such as talent shows. There is a birthday party every month for residents born that month.

The building is designed so that we cannot help but run into other people, and all nursing homes should be built this way.

Amica at Thornhill, is a boutique–style residence situated close to the historic Village of Thornhill, just north of the city. This elegant building is commonly compared to many 5 star hotels, for its beautiful decor, resort - inspired amenity spaces, wellness and vitality program, delicious dishes and unbeatable service. However, the heart of this location is really the "community within the community".

Rose Besser, wife, mother, Holocaust survivor and resident of Amica at Thornhill was like many, not ready to make the move into retirement. Her children played a large part as they felt mom could no longer be independent safely at home. This was a struggle to find the "right" retirement community for mom. It was not until this past year when her health decreased and Rose had to undergo surgery that she agreed to check into Amica at Thornhill for a short-term respite stay, following her rehab at Baycrest. Rose loved her lifestyle and decided to make the move permanent. "I have always been very active. Amica helps me to live my active lifestyle. It's fantastic atmosphere, where people are very pleasant. I would highly recommend Amica to all seniors."

Two years ago Forest Hill Place welcomed a resident who was losing her sight due to macular degeneration. From the onset she has fully embraced retirement living and actively participates in various social gatherings including lecture series, live entertainment and craft classes. In fact she is always making new friends, as she loves to take new residents 'under her wing' and show them around the residence. She is an inspiration not just to the other residents but to the staff and everyone she meets.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

It's been 80 years since Naftali Reingewirtz set up his paint shop at 107 Baldwin St., near Spadina Avenue.

Reingewirtz's grandson, Gary Zweig, now runs Reingewirtz Paints (416-977-3502). Zweig, who is the third generation of his family in the paint business – his father, Seymour Zweig, ran the store for 50 years– says much has changed in the last few years to make paints more environmentally friendly.

Consumers are asking for paints with lower levels of volatile organic compounds (VOCs), he said. "These paints have no smell. They're better for air quality. They reduce air pollution, and they're performing as well as traditional latex paint."

He said that low-VOC paint is latex based and covers surfaces well. "A new technology locks the pigment into the paint so that it spreads well onto the wall."

Zweig advised people to use a latex paintbrush with these paints, which are available in flat, eggshell and semi-gloss, as well as a primer. "They work great and there's less drying time."

He added that Varathane and wood stains are also becoming more environmentally friendly

Changes in paint technology have been ongoing for years. About 35 years ago, lead was banned from paint for safety reasons, Zweig said, and over the years, latex has gained in popularity over oil-based paints, in part for health reasons.

He said many oil-based paints are not as widely available now as they were in the past, and they will probably become even more difficult to find after 2010, should the government enact stricter laws to protect the environment.

Zweig stressed that people should not worry about the esthetics of low-VOC paint because manufacturers such as Benjamin Moore, which he deals with, and Aura have improved the technology. "They're leaders in 'green' paint technology."

All the major paint companies are developing "greener" products to meet government guidelines, Zweig said. "Benjamin Moore is launching their new line this spring."

Zweig said that people need to be educated about low-VOC paint. "The public and the paint professionals have to adapt," he stressed.

Customers will not detect a difference in the quality of low-VOC, in fact, the faster drying time is advantageous, he said. "It can speed up a paint job. You can touch up a wall in 30 minutes, and you can recoat it in about an hour."

He said low-VOC paint is becoming more and more popular. "I get more people asking for it all the time. "

The one caveat of the new technology is that low-VOC paint will increase the price of a paint job. "'Green' paints are more expensive, but the price is worth paying for to keep the environment clean," Zweig said

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

If you are looking for a personal experience in planning and shaping your child's bedroom, a specialty shop is the best way to go.

Located at 1911 Dundas St. E. in Mississauga, Kiddiesworld of Furniture (www.kiddiesworld.ca, 905-624-9092) celebrates its 30th year in business next year. Carrying everything from cribs to beds to strollers, Kiddiesworld caters to all your furniture and accessory needs from tot to teen.

While the store has grown from its relatively humble beginnings into a 13,000-square-foot showroom, it has maintained its personal, family-run approach to the business. Founded by Jerry White in 1980, the store is now co-run by White's son Shawn.

"Back when we started, we only had six cribs on the floor. Now we've got 90!" says Jerry White. "We have a huge selection, but we are not a box store – the experience with us is very special.

"We carry all the furniture you will need for when your child comes into the world up until they are ready to leave the house," White says.

Kiddiesworld carries up to queen size bed sizes for teenagers, and such quality names as Nanart, Bugaboo and Young America. And it is constantly adding to and updating its roster. "It's important for us to be up to date," White says.

With such a vast selection of furniture on the floor, Kiddiesworld can cater to a variety of customers and price points.

"We have strollers that are as affordable as $30 and as high-end as $1,200," White says. "Our customers appreciate savings, but they are also very in tune with what they want."

To get the most bang for your buck, White suggests purchasing pieces with more than one function. Many of the nursery pieces are fully adaptable for a child and even for use into the teen years.

Kiddiesworld also offers a registry service, for moms-to-be. "We like to go through everything together with the customer – it's much more personal than doing it on a computer," White says.

The friendly, knowledgeable staff will walk you through every step, he adds, and "we are into our second generation of customers because of how much the original customers enjoyed their experience with us. Our best advertiser is word of mouth."

Gifts for fussy moms

Another specialty shop for expectant families to consider is Dear-Born Baby at 72 Doncaster Ave., (www.dearbornbaby.com, 905-881-3334), the one-stop-shop for all your newborn's needs. Serving moms and tots since 1979, founder Cathy Scott knows a thing or two about babies.

"I started Dear-Born when I was a relatively new mom," Scott says. "I had two kids at home and was frustrated by the lack of products I could find for them."

Since then, Dear-Born has grown into a full-service destination offering everything from cribs to car seats to clothing and carriers. Boasting a 25-person staff as well as an onsite professional photography studio, Dear-Born truly caters to every facet of a baby's life.

Today, Dear-Born has grown into an online presence as well, offering its extensive selection of products to the online consumer. Shipping across North America, Dear-Born allows you to order gifts for those babies who might be out of hugging reach.

"Our website has been fabulous in connecting to our customers via new methods, such as e-mail blasts, an actively updated blog and our latest venture, Twitter!" Scott says. "New and expectant moms are spending massive amounts of time online, researching the latest and greatest in baby products, and this gives us the opportunity to interact with our clientele even before they stop by the store."

Scott cites eco-awareness and technological advances as the most important trends in the store today. "The green/organic trend has allowed for cottons in clothing and sheets to be made allergy and chemical free, which is very important with newborns."

Video monitors have also replaced voice monitors as the way to keep an eye on sleeping bundles. "People love that they can actually see their baby and know that they are safe," she says.

As far as other safety concerns, Scott warns against buying car seats and strollers second hand. "It's okay to cut back in other areas, but buying potentially unsafe pieces could put your baby at risk," she says. "Do your homework – make sure you know what's safe."

Dear-Born offers professional car seat installations, stroller tune-ups and repairs to ensure the safety of your baby.

The store's registry is a huge part of the business, because it enables new moms to be specific about the products they want for their babies.

"That way, gift-givers are sure that what they are buying is really going to get used," Scott says. "People want the best for their baby – we've definitely got it!"

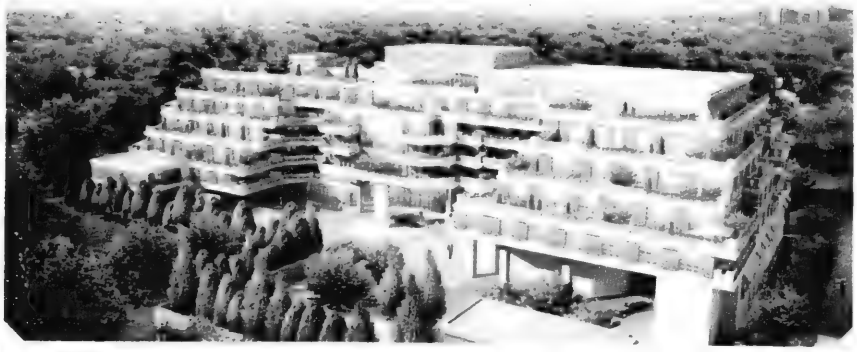
Condos combine convenient location and luxury



By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

Whether you would like to live in the heart of downtown Toronto or in the suburbs, Tribute Communities offers the perfect place to live for those seeking luxury in a convenient location.

Tribute, which has built more than 25,000 homes in its 20-year-plus history, currently has three condominiums under construction, in Oakville, North York and downtown Toronto.

Slated for completion this summer, One Oak Park in Oakville overlooks the lake in beautiful Memorial Park. It consists of two 12-storey condominium towers – about 270 units altogether. Amenities include an exercise room, a party room and an outdoor swimming pool.

Scott McLellan, senior vice-president of sales and marketing for Tribute Communities, said One Oak Park has mainly one bedroom plus a den and two-bedroom units left for sale.

Located just north of Lawrence Avenue West, 1717 Avenue Road in North York, with 80 units in total, is expected to be completed by September 2010. A two-bedroom unit plus a den and a terrace starts at $785,000. Three-bedroom townhouses are also available, as are penthouse suites, starting from $2.4 million. Valet parking, a 24-hour concierge and fitness facilities with saunas are included.

The Tribute project Queen and Portland is due to be completed in early 2011. In downtown Toronto, it will be more than just a condominium. It features a 20,000-square-foot outdoor park on the fifth floor. Getting groceries (and clothes) will be a snap thanks to the Loblaws and Joe Fresh, which will be located below the units. One bedroom, two bedroom plus a den and three-bedroom units are available. Located near restaurants, shopping, nightlife and the Queen streetcar line, this 90-unit condo is in the ideal location for those who crave the true downtown experience.

For more information about Tribute's properties, visit www.tributecommunities.com or call 905-839-3500.

Details make a house a home

Compiled by CJN Staff

Creating a community. Crafting a home. In both, the details make the difference, and once again, Remington Homes has embraced its commitment to Thornhill Valley and the families who live there by designing architecturally significant homes that are classic in design, tastefully appointed and built for convenience and comfort at an affordable price.

For those unfamiliar, Thornhill Valley is a true master-planned community conveniently located between Bathurst and Dufferin streets on the north side of Rutherford Road. The years of careful planning by a team placing great emphasis on traditional values is reflected in the balanced blend of single-family detached homes, luxury semi-detached and their newly released executive, freehold towns. Containing local parks, playgrounds and nearby schools plus offering close proximity to the Lebovic Community Campus, shopping, entertainment venues and major business corridors, Thornhill Valley truly embraces the concept of a complete family lifestyle and is an inviting place to call home.

On May 2, Remington Homes held a "Spin-to-Win" event at their sales office to celebrate the grand opening of their limited release of executive, freehold towns. Over 300 people attended and with only 26 townhouses available in this tiny enclave community, all but six were sold! To add to the excitement, a roulette table was set up in the middle of the sales office and all purchasers were given the chance to "Spin-to-Win" upgrades in their homes. Good fortune reigned supreme as winners walked away with granite countertops as their prize!

Additionally, May 2 marked the grand opening of four furnished model homes. These spectacular showpieces include two semi-detached and two detached homes, magnificently appointed and impressive to all who attended them. In fact, Remington Homes held an inventory clearance on all their semi's and singles that are currently under construction and quite successfully sold much of their inventory. If you are looking for a 2009 closing date, it is certainly the time to explore Remington's selection of quality homes…especially considering their reduced price!

Whether you're just beginning to explore the housing market or are ready to commit to buying a new home, Remington will exceed your expectations at every turn and provide you with the individual attention you deserve. Why buy old when you can buy new?! For about the same price, you can purchase a quality new home with all of today's modern conveniences, superior craftsmanship, fine finishes, exceptional design and energy efficiency. It should be noted that Remington provides their purchasers with an awe-inspiring, magnificently-appointed design studio complete with the services of qualified decorators. The selection will astound you. The design choices will delight you. And in the end, your home will become the sum of all your individual choices and define your personal lifestyle. This is the "artistry of living" and forms part of Remington's dedication to service excellence.

We recommend you visit the Remington Homes Sales Centre on the Northwest corner of Dufferin and Rutherford, open Monday to Thursday from 1pm – 7pm; Saturday, Sunday and holidays from 11am – 5pm. Don't miss out! Remington Homes offers serious deals for serious buyers!

The perfect steak awaits at Sobie's Barbecues

By MARNI BRINDER BYK

Sobie's Barbecues (416-224-2526, www.sobies.com) has been helping Torontonians grill the perfect steak for the past 22 years.

In the last 10 years, owner Febian Frempong has seen the emergence of infrared technology in barbecues, which he says is causing a lot of people to consider a new way of grilling this season.

The infrared barbecue is modelled after the charcoal method of barbecuing: you can't see a flame, but you can definitely feel the heat.

The technology decreases cooking time by almost half, because it doesn't use the convection method of cooking food like gas and charcoal models do. Instead, gas is forced through thousands of holes in a ceramic plate, converting the heat into infrared energy. The infrared barbecue heats up very quickly and can cook at temperatures as high as 1,200 to 1,300 degrees.

The technology has also been adapted for indoor and outdoor saunas. As with the barbecues, you can feel the heat, but you can't see the heat source.

Frempong compares the method to sitting out in the sun: "You can feel the heat like the sun, but you don't get burned."

Sobie's Barbecues still provides customers with the option of gas or charcoal barbecues, but Frempong says the infrared models are becoming very popular. Great for searing, the barbecues appeal to the high-end griller.

Frempong's average customer is not someone who goes to the big-box stores in search of a barbecue, because they don't have the time and they want to use the very best.

And because customers have busy schedules, Sobie's can arrange delivery, setup and training for customers on how to use their new barbecues.

With the summer fast approaching, the time is now to set up your barbecue. The perfect steak is waiting.

MintoMidtown offers buyers the amenities of Yonge and Eglinton

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

If the hustle-bustle of downtown isn't your thing and the sleepy solitude of the suburbs doesn't grab you either, where else can you go to live?

For a growing number of Torontonians, the answer is midtown.

"Many [people who] have lived most of their lives near [Yonge and Eglinton]... love the area," says Darcia Rowntree, vice-president of sales with Minto, creators of the MintoMidtown condominium development in the heart of the area.

"They treasure the shops, the restaurants and the terrific convenience... [and] they don't want the bustle of Bloor or Yorkville."

Indeed, the famous Toronto hot spot provides a unique blend of green spaces and quiet side streets, with a bevy of arts and entertainment options.

Another feature many folks find alluring about Yonge and Eglinton is that it's right along the subway line, offering both convenience and an environmentally friendly way to travel.

If you're in the market for a condominium, keep in mind the types of perks and amenities the development offers, such as whether it has a 24-hour concierge service, state-of-the-art fitness facilities and an indoor pool, all of which are features of MintoMidtown.

It also has an entertainment lounge with a private dining room and bar, as well as a third-floor outdoor terrace that's fully landscaped and a courtyard.

"It is a wonderful community within the city," says Rowntree. "A true vertical neighbourhood with a terrific range of amenities."

These days, luxury suites and penthouses in midtown tend to offer two- and three-bedroom options.

MintoMidtown suites include such features as hardwood flooring, floor-to-ceiling windows, open-concept kitchen and family room designs, granite countertops, multiple walk-in closets, spacious living areas and a variety of energy-efficient elements.

To that end, Minto is in the process of gaining LEED (Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design) certification and has a team in place charged with ensuring the development is particularly green.

Experience, stellar customer service and a penchant for developing condominium facilities that suit the lifestyles of residents are all features you should expect.

"We showed our expertise for building luxury over a decade ago with the Prince Arthur on Avenue Road."

Real estate company finds properties in Florida

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Got some extra cash on hand and looking for a warm weather vacation property far from the Great White North?

With the collapse of the U.S. housing market, Canadians are increasingly looking south for opportunities to obtain quality residences at affordable prices.

Florida Home Finders of Canada (FHFC), a licensed real estate company, is positioning itself to assist Canadians buy into the U.S. market, which has seen massive price drops in recent years.

Their pitch is simple: this is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to purchase a second home at prices that may never be repeated.

Wayne Levy, a partner at FHFC, said, "If you want that dream of the sun in Florida, now is the time to act on it."

News reports have highlighted the large number of properties subject to foreclosures and forced sales in the U.S. sunbelt after the puncturing of the real estate bubble. Sniffing a bargain, 150,000 Canadians purchased a second home in the United States in 2008 – 40 per cent of them in Florida.

Home prices are down some 40 to 50 per cent from their peaks in late 2005 and early 2006, Levy said.

'A financially attractive investment that is likely to appreciate'

"From our conversations with developers and realtors [in Florida], I believe the bottom has been reached." People who were "kicking the tires" in the fall are now purchasing, he added.

FHFC has relationships with American builders and is focusing on five Florida communities: Orlando, West Palm Beach, Naples, Fort Myers and Charlotte Bay. It can also put buyers in touch with agents in other cities, such as Miami and Hollywood.

The properties it handles were erected in the last few years and are in well-priced, gated communities that offer many amenities. Some properties resemble five-star resorts, with extravagant swimming pools, club houses, tennis courts, gyms, Internet cafes and spas. They're safe and they were constructed under terms of the most recent building codes, making them insurable against hurricanes, Levy said.

"They're spectacular and they're 40 to 50 per cent less than they were three years ago," he added.

Because of the economic downturn, some builders have been stuck with properties that potential buyers have walked away from (losing their deposit). That means buyers are in the driver's seat. One Orlando developer is "throwing in a $30,000 U.S. furniture package" for a home that once retailed for $300,000 and is now being offered for $175,000, he said.

'Experience the Sunshine State lifestyle first hand'

A new building in West Palm Beach geared to the 55+ crowd is available for $115,000 (US). Its amenities include tennis courts and a par-three executive golf course. In addition, there are no restrictions on the number of rentals per year, meaning a buyer who is not ready to retire can acquire the property and rent it for much of the year, making it a financially attractive investment that is likely to appreciate, Levy said.

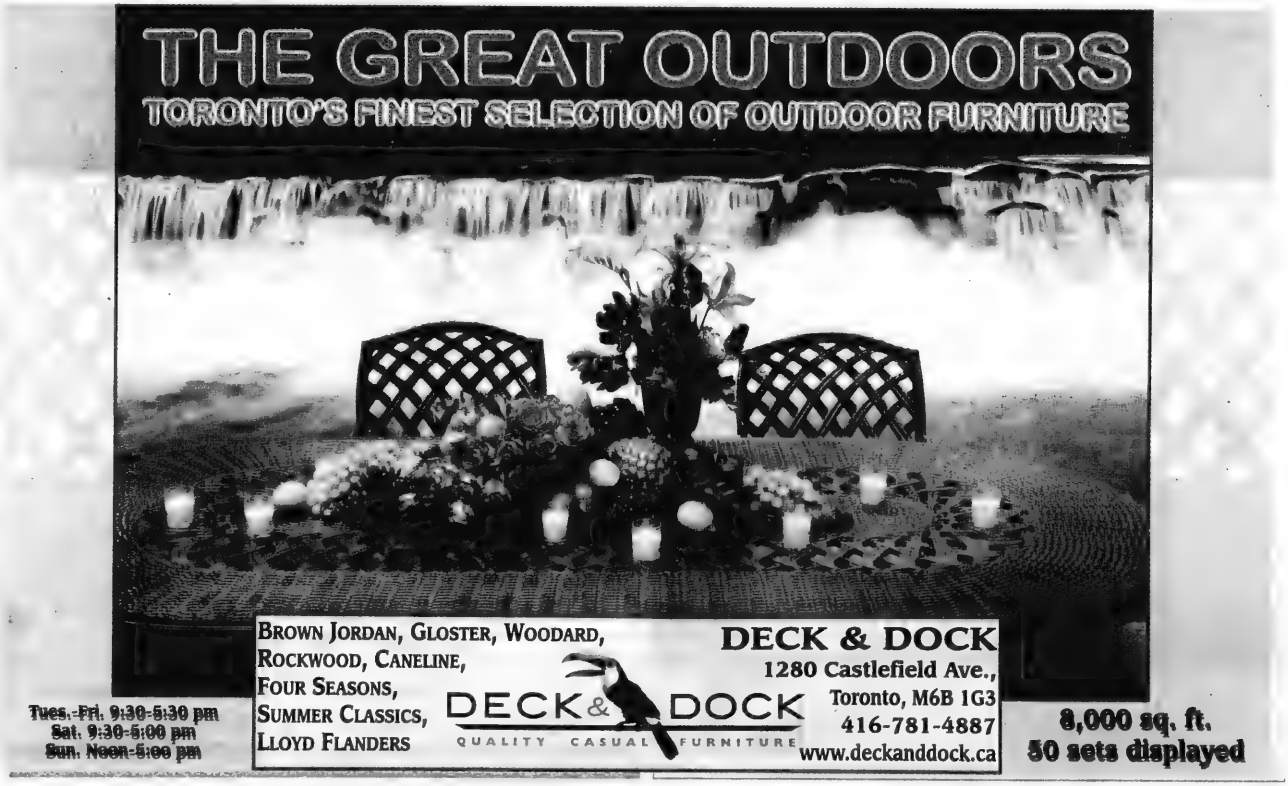
In some developments FHFC clients may be able to stay on site as a guest to experience the Sunshine State lifestyle first hand. FHFC clients may receive a credit of up to $1,500 (US) on closing when they purchase a developer's sell-off unit.

FHFC has relationships with Canadian-owned banks doing business in Florida and, ironically, "it's easier for Canadians to get credit" in the United States than Americans, Levy said.

Buyers are expected to come up with a 25 per cent down payment, and a typical open mortgage with a five-year term and 30-year amortization is available at 5.5 per cent.

If the Canadian dollar rises – it stood at around 84 cents (US) last week – those payments become easier to handle for those holding Canadian currency, Levy said, although he acknowledged buyers face a currency risk if the U.S. dollar appreciates.

Established in 1989, Florida Home Finders of Canada (www.floridahomefinders.ca) is a licensed real estate company that provides buyers with services including financing, insurance, legal and taxation issues and property management.



Unique home furnishings that also help save the planet

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

In tough economic times, people cut back. Less dining out, more staying in, less extravagant spending and more emphasis on smarter spending. At the same time, going "green" has never been more popular – every grocery store has an organic section or aisle, and even every child knows the importance of the three Rs: reduce, reuse and recycle.

Three Greater Toronto Area business owners are among those currently addressing both your need to spend less and your desire to go green, going above and beyond the standard Rs by reducing waste through recycling, sometimes refinishing and/or refurbishing, and then reselling furniture and other household items for reuse.

LHL Design's Da-MaSk brand (416-919-9722, www.lhldesign.com) promotes "going green in the art world." Lorynne Lofsky, owner of LHL Design and co-creator of Da-MaSk, started with tile and carpet samples that were bound for landfill. Suppliers do not require samples to be returned, and they are therefore often discarded. When Lofsky recognized that there was "so much waste" in the industry, she started Da-MaSk in December 2008 to allow professional local artists to take non-renewable resources and give them a second chance.

Some of the items available are custom damask and flocking frames, paintings, mirrors, serving pieces, accessories and furniture, all created using refurbished or recycled items.

Encouraging economic and environmental sustainability, Da-MaSk works with its customers to take special items that do not necessarily work with their décor and change these items to meet their taste.

Da-MaSk will be selling a variety of its products for the first time in public, at the Israel Day festival on Sunday, June 7, at Mel Lastman Square.

For the last 20 years, Wendy Tepperman has been buying and selling quality secondhand furniture. Her business, Contents For Homes, purchases a wide variety of home furnishings, ranging from antiques to modern décor, and sells them to the public seven days a week in her 4,000-square-foot store at 94 Doncaster Ave., just north of Toronto in Thornhill.

All furniture items acquired by Contents For Home are solid wood and do not need refinishing, and the price is always negotiable. Since Tepperman focuses on meeting the needs of her customers, furniture sets can be split up, appraisals can be arranged, and she can even organize a contents sale in a client's home if necessary.

When asked how the business has changed over the years, Tepperman said she recognizes that younger customers seem more educated about buying better pieces that will last longer, and can appreciate the "green" aspect of her business.

"This is recycling for your home," she says.

If you can't find exactly what you are looking for at the store, Tepperman will record your needs in her wish book and will call or e-mail to inform you when a piece that meets your needs arrives. With items arriving constantly, there's always a good reason to visit Contents For Homes. Perhaps your next visit will result in your finding a unique piece of furniture for your own home.

Modern patios furnished with sofas, love seats

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

There are some who refer to summer as bathing suit season, others think of it as patio season. For those of you who have been dreaming of breaking out the barbecue all winter, we've got just the place for you.

Located at 1280 Castlefield Ave., Deck & Dock is a virtual emporium of outdoor furniture for patios and cottages (416-781-4887, www.deckanddock.ca).

Originally located in Muskoka, Deck & Dock brings the great outdoors to Torontonians. Serving the Toronto area for more than 14 years, Deck & Dock has a vast showroom space that allows you to see outdoor furniture as it should be. "We have a very unique, nature-like setup with trees as far as the eye can see," said owner Dave Reburn. "That way the customer is able to envision the actual environment their furniture will sit in."

With a large selection of wrought iron, wicker, teak and aluminum, Deck & Dock has furniture for every taste. "We have everything from the very traditional to ultra-modern," he said. As such, the brands carried by Deck & Dock run the gamut from the century-old wicker brand, Lloyd Flanders, to the contemporary steel and teak brand, Brown Jordan.

"Our customers pay just as much attention to outdoor décor as indoor, so we like to help them with the overall concept," Reburn said.

The store offers more than 150 fabric samples to choose from. The fabric can then be custom fit to furniture, which is delivered within four to five weeks. With advances in fabric durability, such as acrylic finishing, cushions have become a major feature of outdoor furniture.

Casual café seating, as well as sofas and love seats, are becoming hugely popular in modern patios. "Since most patios are directly outside the dining room or kitchen, why not try something different," Reburn said.

New cantilever umbrellas allow for a more casual environment as well. "The cantilever umbrellas are suspended over the table from the side, rather than obstructing the middle of the table," Reburn said. Cantilevers can also swing 360 degrees to cover different areas of the backyard, as the sun shifts during the day.

For budget-friendly options, Reburn suggested trying a mix-and-match approach. "We are always updating our inventory, so there are lots of opportunities to choose some pieces from older seasons," he said.

Friendly and knowledgeable service is key at Deck & Dock. As well as its design and customization service, Deck & Dock offers the option and storing your outdoor furniture with them over the winter.

"We will pick everything up – clean it, store it and return it back to you next season," Reburn said. "We have lots of space."

Boasting a combined 60 years of experience, the staff is there to help you every step of the way – from design to delivery.

Store carries a lot of history

Still another place to shop for interesting items is Around The Block (416-546-1760, www.aroundtheblock.com, unique@aroundtheblock.com), where owner Warren Hales says that "in tough times, people still want to decorate, but are more price conscious," and that's why he encourages people to come to his store at 1903 Avenue Rd.

The consignment store has been in this location for a year and carries everything for your home décor needs, from furniture to candlesticks, antique to contemporary. Hales believes the items Around The Block carries are styles you are not going to find anywhere else and very good quality.

For example, if you are looking for something unique with a bit of history, he has a 100-year-old dining room set that he is sure will still be in use for another century – but will most likely be sold by time this article goes to print. The fluidity of the consignment business is like that; items in the store change regularly and something you admire today may be gone tomorrow.

Hales promises the items for sale at Around The Block will provide customers with "décor as unique as you are." His customers are either looking to work with him and his staff for a family estate sale or waiting to purchase something special to fill their home.

He believes that today's customer is more open to ideas and willing to mix and match pieces. He also knows how important it is to get it right – he keeps his website up to date with featured items available in the store and has a customer wish list so that any new items arriving in the store can be easily matched to a deserving home in need of something special.

Real estate market is 'alive and well,' says broker

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The current global recession hasn't had a significant affect on most Canadians and the real estate market in Toronto reflects that.

Michael Harari, an associate broker with RE/MAX, said that although the price of homes and the number of sales are slightly lower than they were this time last year, he's confident that more Torontonians are going to enter the market this spring.

"I think it took about three or four months for people to get over the shell shock over what was going on in the economy. People are now coming back to life and saying, 'You know, I still have a job and the whole world didn't cave in overnight,'" Harari said.

Based on data from the Toronto Real Estate Board, he said there was only a five per cent drop in prices from March 2008 to March 2009.

"It shows that the amount of sales is down seven per cent from last year at this time. It's not terrible… In March, we reported 6,171 sales, which is down seven per cent from March the year earlier. Last year, they had sold 6,700 at that time," Harari said.

"The price of the transactions, the average in March of '09 was $362,000. That was down five per cent from March of '08."

He said that February was a slow month, but since March, he's seen an increase in the number of sales.

"Usually the spring is a better time. People start taking advantage of the weather, and the mortgage rates are very low, so people are probably taking advantage," he said.

"The prices have also readjusted from the year before, the prices are better, so all this comes in to one package. More people are out there buying."

He said that first-time home buyers are the ones who are pushing the market, while people who are looking to upgrade or downsize aren't as active in the market.

Darren Slavens, a broker and vice-president of Slavens and Associates Real Estate Inc, said that despite misconceptions that the real estate market is dead, "it's alive and well."

He guessed that some people may be biding their time to buy a home because they're waiting for a major drop in the value of homes.

Slavens said he doesn't think a major drop is coming, but with the real estate market, there are never any guarantees.

"The price [of homes] could decrease and it could increase… I'm a buy and hold kind of guy, but I think what people consistently forget is that regardless of the value of their home, whether it goes up or goes down, while they are owning they are paying down their equity and they are building equity in their homes."

Spring sees increase in sales

Slavens said that if someone buys a home for $100,000, but the following year, it's only worth $90,000, the homeowner is still in a better position than a renter.

"Instead of blowing your money on rent every month, which equates to nothing, you're still going to be making money in the long run because you're paying down the equity," he said.

Another advantage of buying a home right now, Slavens added, is that interest rates are so low – the Bank of Canada recently cut the key interest rate to 0.25 per cent.

"The money is so extraordinarily cheap. I just sold a condo to a guy who was paying $1,750 a month in rent, and I think with his purchase he's paying $1,800. Fifty bucks more a month, and he's building equity every month," he said.

"Money is so cheap right now and prices have come down, probably on average, a good 15 per cent, so it is exceptionally affordable to buy. The market that we predominantly deal in, people are secure in their jobs. If people are secure, or at least feel secure in their jobs and they have some cash that hasn't been depleted to far, it's a great time to buy. But you want to be secure in your job before you make a decision like that."

But the first step to buying a home, is getting pre-approved for a mortgage, Slavens said.

"I definitely recommend that they… speak to their Realtor about getting pre-approved, so they know what they can afford. I think the most important thing is to not put yourself in a position where you are going to be house poor. Make sure you can cover your monthly costs and not sacrifice too much of your life. With the way interest rates are right now, it is certainly attainable for pretty much everybody."

Michael Harari

Darren Slavens

Harari said that it is also important to do research on an area they are interested in.

"Knowing what the sales have been in the past, knowing what is available and getting into a certain area in the market and becoming familiar with it before blindly going in and buying something [is important]."

Harari added that a common misconception is that the value of Toronto homes are less than they used to be. As a result, some buyers put forth offers that are too low and they are not being taken seriously.

"Some people are trying to get homes worth much less than they are probably worth and they are not getting deals done because of that," Harari said.

As for the variable versus fixed-rate mortgage debate, Harari and Slavens agree that it's up to the individual to decide which works best for them.

But Harari personally seems to think he lost out on savings by locking in on a fixed-rate mortgage.

"I think most people are going variable at the moment. They're staying open," Harari said.

"I probably made a mistake by fixing myself in three years ago. I probably could have saved thousands of dollars. But some people like to know and don't want to live with a variable, and some people are more willing to live day by day and see."

Slavens said he is a fan of fixed-rate mortgages because they are not as risky.

"I think there is a misconception among people that when they have a variable rate and they decide they want to lock in, that they will be locking in at their variable rate or some sort of preferred rate," he said.

"It's important that people remember that when you decide to fix your mortgage, you're not going to be getting the best rate out there, you're going to be getting the posted rate. Your bank has already got you, your lender has already got you, so why are they going to give you their best rate?

"It is important not to be too greedy in these times and I think if you can get 3.5 or 3.6 per cent mortgages, you should just grab it and hold on to it for as long as you can."

Canada, Israel mark 60 years of strong ties

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Israeli and Canadian politicians last week celebrated 60 years of diplomatic relations between their two countries.

May 11 marked "a milestone that reflects the breadth and depth of the links between two democratic allies," Lawrence Cannon, Canada's minister of foreign affairs, said in a statement, after an all-party motion was passed in the House of Commons marking the occasion.

"One of the underlying strengths of the Canada-Israel relationship is the extensive network of informal links between our two countries," Cannon said. "There are some 20,000 Canadian citizens living in Israel, and many Canadians have family there. The Canadian Jewish community is 350,000 strong and acts as an important bridge between Canada and Israel. These strong ties give rise to significant co-operation between our two countries in business, education, culture, philanthropy and tourism."

Cannon also cited the ever-strengthening bond between Canada and the Jewish state, and pointed to recent examples "evidenced by increased co-operation in several areas, including public security, defence, trade and investment, and an increase in political-level contact."

According to the government of Canada website, "Israel is Canada's fourth-largest merchandise export market in the Middle East and North Africa… [and] Canada's top exports to Israel are machinery, electrical machinery, paper and newsprint, plastics, wood and aluminum. Canada's top imports from Israel are pharmaceutical products, electrical machinery, precious stones and metals, machinery, optical equipment and organic chemicals."

CIJA Urges Protest

TORONTO — The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) is urging Canadian Jews to protest a conference at York University that CIJA says will "explore a one-state, bi-national solution to the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians... which would spell the end of Israel as a Jewish state." CIJA CEO Hershell Ezrin said the event will add to the tense climate at York on this issue. "Israel-Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace" runs June 22-24. Ezrin said the presence of "a few balanced speakers of high repute" won't be "enough to characterize the conference as one of high academic integrity."

Sculptor Resigns

TORONTO — A Toronto sculptor has resigned from the board and the arts advisory committee of the Koffler Centre for the Arts to protest its decision earlier this month to break ties with an anti-Zionist artist who supports Israeli Apartheid Week. Yvonne Singer, an associate professor of fine arts at York University, said in a letter of resignation that the move compromises freedom of expression, the Toronto Star reported. Artist Reena Katz got $20,000 from Koffler for an exhibit about Toronto's Kensington Market that opened in the market last week. Part of the Luminato arts festival, it will continue through July 26, but Koffler will no longer promote it. Centre officials said they didn't know about Katz's views when she got funding, but she says her views were well-known.

Actor Defends Play

TORONTO — Famed Canadian actor R.H. Thomson last week defended his decision to take part in readings put on by Crow's Theatre of the controversial play Seven Jewish Children at Toronto's Theatre Passe Muraille on May 17. "Discussion, dialogue, talk, conversation is what is needed, and this play is sparking that," Thomson told the Globe and Mail, adding he doesn't see himself on one side or the other of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. B'nai Brith Canada said the 10-minute play, by Briton Caryn Churchill, is anti-Semitic because it depicts Israeli Jews as "bloodthirsty aggressors and child killers." It wanted the play pulled from the city-owned theatre.

WORLD

Hotel Refuses Jews

VIENNA — An Austrian hotel refused to accept a Jewish family as guests. The owner of the Haus Sonnenhof in the village of Serfaus in the Austrian Tyrol told a Viennese Jewish family it doesn't take Jewish guests, citing "bad experiences" in the past, the daily Tiroler Tageszeitung reported. The Serfaus region has become popular with Orthodox Jewish vacationers in recent years. Local officials called the refusal "unacceptable."

Actress Bumped

MELBOURNE — A performance by an award-winning Jewish actress was cancelled by a Jewish group in Melbourne because of her participation in a controversial play about Israel. British-born Miriam Margolyes, 67, was slated to star this week in Seven Jewish Children, a play that critics say is anti-Semitic. The 10-minute play, sub-titled A Play For Gaza, was to be staged during a fundraiser for Australians for Palestine at the State Library of Victoria on May 18. It traces the history of Israel, from the Holocaust to the recent Gaza war. Margolyes was also set to entertain elderly residents May 12 at JewishCare, a facility in Melbourne, but was told she might offend residents who are Shoah survivors. "I think they're quite wrong. I would never get involved with anything which was either anti-Semitic or critical of Holocaust survivors," Margolyes said. She signed a petition by Independent Jewish Voices in 2008, but said she's a proud Jew and wants Israel to survive.

Demjanjuk Deported To Germany

BERLIN — Accused Nazi war criminal John Demjanjuk arrived in Germany last week to stand trial for war crimes committed during World War II.

Police in Munich confirmed May 12 that Demjanjuk, deported from the United States May 11 on a medically equipped charter flight, had arrived and was taken to the hospital wing of Stadelheim Prison to await trial.

Demjanjuk, 89, was removed from his home near Cleveland, Ohio, on May 11 by ambulance and taken to the airport, accompanied by a doctor and nurse.

He's accused of having been a guard at the Sobibor death camp in Poland from March to September 1943, and having been involved in the murder of at least 29,000 Jews.

Demjanjuk, who contests the charges, has lived in a suburb of Cleveland since 1952. He was accused in the early 1980s of being a guard at the Treblinka death camp, but was released from jail in Israel after seven years, when another Ukrainian was identified as the guard in question.

The U.S. Justice Department again charged the retired autoworker with being a guard at Sobibor and revoked his citizenship in 2002 for lying about his Nazi past to gain entry to the United States. His deportation was approved in 2005. Germany requested his extradition in March.

Demjanjuk fought the deportation, appealing to the U.S. Supreme Court, saying he was too ill to make the trip and withstand trial.

Survivors Attacked

VIENNA — Five Austrian teens aged 14 to 17 were arrested after a neo-Nazi attack May 9 on Holocaust survivors. The survivors and others in a group from France and Italy were marking the 64th anniversary of the liberation of a concentration camp near Salzburg. Calling the incident one of the worst in postwar Austria, authorities said it shows the growing extremism among youth. The teens, who had no previous record, shouted "Heil Hitler" and wounded two people when they fired plastic bullets from air guns.

Parents tell of their sons who met tragic yet heroic ends

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The parents of two Israeli soldiers who met tragic yet heroic ends – Roi Klein and Noam Apter – were in Toronto last week as part of a North American tour to share inspirational stories about their late sons.

Aharon and Shosh Klein and Yossi and Pirhiya Apter visited students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (TanenbaumCHAT) on May 11 to screen documentary films about their sons, and to share personal stories about the soldiers' dedication to Judaism, and to Israel and its people.

The Kleins and the Apters, who stopped in Chicago, Detroit and Hamilton before coming to Toronto, were travelling on a tour organized by Lior Shtul, the director general of Bnei David, the Military Academy of Israel.

The school's mission is to foster a love of Torah and a commitment to the State of Israel, values that Roi Klein and Noam Apter shared.

In 2002, Apter was one of four students who was murdered in a terrorist attack at Yeshivat Otniel while working in the kitchen preparing a Shabbat dinner for about 100 students in the dining room next door.

Two terrorists began shooting into the school from outside, and one gained entrance to the kitchen.

In a split second, Apter – who had studied at the Kfar Haroeh Yeshiva before he began his service in the Israel Defence Forces at the Otniel Yeshiva by combining Torah study with army service as a paratrooper – made the decision to lock the door to the dining room, which gave the seated students a chance to escape.

Apter was shot dead. He was 23 years old.

Roi Klein, who was a major in the Golani Brigade of the IDF, was killed in the Battle of Bint Jbeil during the Second Lebanon War in 2006 after jumping on a grenade to save his fellow soldiers.

Klein, once a Bnei David student, was a religious man, a young husband and father of two, who was dedicated to the Jewish faith and the Jewish state.

During a mission in Bint Jbeil, Klein and his men were ambushed by the enemy. When Klein received word that one of his soldiers had been wounded, he and members of his unit worked to lift the wounded soldier onto a stretcher to take him out of harm's way.

When Klein spotted a live grenade that had landed near his men, he jumped on the grenade to absorb the explosion and save the lives of his soldiers.

Pope Benedict sees hatred up close

Pope Benedict and the other religious dignitaries at the special interfaith ecumenical evening last Monday, including Rabbi Sha'ar Yashuv Cohen, the Chief Rabbi of Haifa, were stunned into shock.

From the editor's desk...

The tone alone of the statement read by Sheikh Tayseer Tamimi, the Palestinian Authority's chief legal authority, left the other men of God sitting alongside the Pope on the small dais in the Notre Dame Pontifical Institute in Jerusalem on edge, uncomfortable and quite angry.

Tamimi spoke after the Pope had addressed the audience on the subject of peaceful coexistence and inter-religious understanding.

The Palestinian cleric, however, was not scheduled to speak.

Tamimi seized the microphone, so to speak, to hector the Bishop of Rome for 10 minutes about a subject on which he has shown affinity, acumen and acknowledged expertise: hatred of Israel and Jews.

His bilious rant against Israel was his usual fare: frenzied, almost ecstatic vilification. He accused Israel of all manner of war crimes: "killing Gaza's children," "bulldozing Palestinian homes," "destroying mosques" and "confiscating Palestinians' land."

He also called for the immediate return of all Palestinian refugees and concluded his hymnal to coexistence by urging Christians and Muslims to unite against the Jews of Israel.

The Latin Patriarch of the Holy Land, Fouad Twal, tried in vain to stop Tamimi. But Tamimi paid him no heed. He was determined to say his theological piece.

The Vatican representatives scrambled to distance themselves from Tamimi's tirade. Father Federico Lombardi, director of the Holy See Press Office, issued the following statement:

"The intervention of Sheikh Tayseer Tamimi was not scheduled by the organizers of the meeting. In a meeting dedicated to dialogue, this intervention was a direct negation of what a dialogue should be. We hope that such an incident will not damage the mission of the Pope aiming at promoting peace and also interreligious dialogue, as he has clearly affirmed on many occasions during this pilgrimage. We hope also that interreligious dialogue in the Holy Land will not be compromised by this incident."

He described Tamimi's remarks as "words of hatred uttered by the sheikh, who instead of fostering peace and coexistence chose to plant seeds of division and confrontation between Israelis and Palestinians, as well as between Jews, Muslims and Christians."

Pope Benedict stands with Latin Patriarch Fuad Twal, centre, and Sheikh Taiseer Tamimi, head of the Palestinian Authority's Sharia Courts before the ecumenical meeting began last week in Jerusalem. [Israel Sun photo]

In truth, however, the Vatican's organizers of the meeting should not have been surprised by Tamimi's unwelcome discourse.

As reported in the Jerusalem Post, Tamimi behaved exactly the same way in a similar forum during Pope John Paul II's visit to Israel in March 2000.

"Then, Tamimi called on 'the occupier' to stop 'strangling Jerusalem and oppressing its residents.' Citing land confiscations, house demolitions, settlements and the Baruch Goldstein massacre in Hebron in 1994, Tamimi said Israel had a long record of 'genocide' and 'shooting and wounding Palestinian children. He also refused to shake the hand of then-chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau."

Of course, Tamimi's explosion was disrespectful in the extreme to the Pope and to the intended dignity of the occasion. It also embarrassed the pontiff. Tamimi exploited the moment and the wide reverence for the bishop's cloth to spread hatred.

He made a mockery of the foundational idea of goodwill among men, of actually seeking common theological ground, and of simply trying to find answers to thorny problems.

Tamimi's instruction were undoubtedly eye-opening for the Pope. Tamimi holds a very important and prestigious position in the institutional hierarchy of the Palestinians. He is the chief judge of the sharia courts in the West Bank.

His opinions carry weight among his people. His opinions are religiously authoritative. They serve as precedents for further religious learning and education.

The Pope peered up close into the maw of unrepentant hatred last week. It must have been frightening.

Many inspired by sons' sacrifice

Klein was buried on his 31st birthday at Mount Herzel.

Following the presentation at TanenbaumCHAT during which the students learned about the two men, Shosh Klein, Roi's mother and Yossi Apter, Noam's father, spoke to The CJN about the purpose of their visits with Jewish communities in the Disapora.

"Our goal is to, first of all, tell his story and, second of all, convince the students in the audience to take the values of such heroes to their own lives," Apter said.

"We feel that this is a wonderful way of memorializing… our son."

He said that while he and his wife feel comfort when they share his story, they are also encouraged by the fact that many are inspired by it.

"Before I left Israel, I got an e-mail from a young girl, I think 18 years old. She heard us in Los Angeles last year, and after she heard us, she decided to move to Israel. She said that instead of going to college in L.A., she switched to learn at Tel Aviv University," Apter said.

Roi Klein's mother, Shosh, said she also sees the benefits of sharing her pain with Jews around the world.

"My son was a real hero, a kiddush HaShem. He gave his life, and the price that we paid for this tragedy is unbearable. It's terrible, and I want Jews abroad to feel that it's not easy. It's not easy to live in Israel," she said.

"By coming here and listening to them and having their support, we feel the strength… The fact that I can share with them gives me a lot of strength, and I feel that I am not alone."

Klein said she hopes people will remember her son as being a good man in all aspects of his life.

"I want people to know about my brave son and what kind of a great person he was and what a wonderful father and son and officer and everything."

Apter said the message he hopes to convey to people who learn about Noam is that "the decision to give your life in order to save the lives of your friends, it doesn't come in a moment at the end of your life. It's a way of education."

Israeli PM urged to back two-state solution

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu should explicitly come out in support of a two-state solution, says Colette Avital, the international secretary of the left-of-centre Labor party, a partner in Netanyahu's right-wing coalition government.

"He'll have to adopt that kind of policy at the end of the day," she said in an interview in Toronto just prior to Netanyahu's much anticipated meeting with U.S. President Barack Obama at the White House on May 18.

"Netanyahu doesn't want to be on a collision course with the United States," she added in a reference to Obama's espousal of the two-state model to resolve Israel's conflict with the Palestinians.

Describing Obama as "a breath of fresh air" and a leader "who means business," she said he wants to advance the Arab-Israeli peace process and is therefore "a very good thing for Israel."

Although Netanyahu has said he is prepared to resume peace talks with the Palestinians without delay, he and Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman have declined to openly endorse a two-state solution.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has warned that he won't negotiate with Israel unless the current Israeli leadership accepts the two-state model.

Avital, who lost her parliamentary seat in last winter's election after 10 years in the Knesset, observed that Netanyahu's immediate predecessors, Ariel Sharon and Ehud Olmert, both former members of Netanyahu's Likud party, endorsed the two-state concept.

Urging Netanyahu to relent, Avital – Israel's former ambassador to Portugal and its former consul general in New York City – said that Israel has a vested interest in Palestinian statehood.

"If we want to continue as a Jewish state, we have to separate from the Palestinians," she said.

Ratcheting up her warning, she added, "Unless we reach an agreement with the Palestinians, we will end up as a minority in our own land and with a binational state."

Colette Avital

Here to speak to ARZA Canada, the Zionist voice of the Reform movement, she noted that support for a two-state solution in on the wane as a one-state solution is becoming increasingly popular in Palestinian and European circles.

Scoffing at Netanyahu's insistence that the Palestinians must recognize Israel as a Jewish state or face the possibility that the peace process may wither, Avital said, "We can live without this recognition. It is we who should define the identity of our state."

Avital, a candidate for Israel's presidency in 2007, advised Netanyahu to accept the Arab League peace proposal, which broadly calls for the normalization of relations between Israel and the Arab world in exchange for Israel's withdrawal to the pre-1967 border.

"Not everything in the plan is what we like, but it can be a basis for talks."

Avital said she has no desire to criticize Netanyahu, who assumed office less than two months ago.

"He should be given a chance."

But she was fairly critical of Lieberman, who has ascribed Israel's diplomatic deadlock with the Palestinians to Iranian meddling rather than to Israel's occupation of the territories captured in the Six Day War.

"His views are extreme," she said, referring in particular to Lieberman's call for an Israeli Arab loyalty test.

Israel and the Palestinians both share responsibility for the current diplomatic impasse, she said.

The Palestinians should have developed the Gaza Strip after Israel's unilateral withdrawal in 2005, while Israel should not have built more settlements during the Oslo peace process.

Asked about Iran's quest for a nuclear arsenal, Avital said that United Nations economic sanctions should be tightened if Iran, after talks with the United States, refuses to suspend its uranium enrichment program.

Declining to say whether she supports an Israeli military strike on Iran's nuclear facilities, she said, "A nuclear Iran is a threat to the whole Middle East. It's the responsibility of the entire world. Why should Israel do the job for everyone else? It should not be left as an Israeli problem."

Turning to domestic politics, Avital said that if it had been up to her, she would have counselled Labour party leader and Defence Minister Ehud Barak not to join Netanyahu's government.

"But I respect his decision," she said, explaining that Barak had good reasons to join the coalition at a time when Israel faces enormous security challenges.

But she said she doesn't know whether the move will benefit Labor.

Avital disputed former foreign minister Tzipi Livni's assertion that Barak will be a "fig leaf" in Netanyahu's government. "Barak has never been a fig leaf. He is a very strong person."

Asked what she would advise Barak to do if he fails to moderate Netantyahu's policies, Avital replied, "I hope he has the guts and courage to leave the government."

Avital also disagreed with a call by Amir Peretz, Barak's predecessor as defence minister and Labor leader, that the party – which won only 13 seats in the last election – should reinvent itself into "a new, genuine labour party."

Iran should top the agenda

These words were written prior to the planned meeting in Washington between U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. There was a great deal of nervousness among Israelis and supporters of Israel prior to the meeting. Ever since Netanyahu assumed office, pundits in both countries have suggested that the differences between the two leaders are significant. They share neither the same philosophical approach, nor the detailed steps on how to achieve Mideast peace, let alone, perhaps, the same ultimate agenda.

We suspect the differences between the two leaders are not as significant as many experts say. The meeting this week will likely confirm this. However, even if the two leaders do diverge in some matters – even important ones – we hope and trust that the subject of Iran will be at the top of the agenda.

The rulers in Iran are the pre-eminent threat to peace in the Middle East, and one can argue, even beyond the region.

The evidence is now incontrovertible that Tehran is fully engaged in undermining and destabilizing not only the efforts to achieve peace, but the key governments that are striving for that peace.

Last week the Financial Times reported that Hezbollah, Tehran's Shia surrogate, has been deeply involved in assisting the Hamas rulers of Gaza. Sheik Naim Qassem, deputy secretary general of Hezbollah, told the paper that his organization has been providing Palestinians in Gaza with "every type of support" possible.

The report in the Financial Times came days after the Egyptian media disclosed the existence of a Hezbollah network on Egyptian soil. The Hezbollah operatives were discovered in late 2008, but the discovery was made public only last month.

In a speech he gave in on April 23, he alluded quite plainly to the threat emanating from Iran. "We affirm our Arab identity and will not allow the interference of regional elements that are opposed to peace and are pushing the region to the edge of an abyss. [Our emphasis] Those elements seek to impose their influence and agenda on our Arab world, incite disagreements on the Arab and Palestinian scene and send their agents [namely, Hezbollah] to the region in order to threaten Egypt's national security, harm its borders, and compromise its stability."

There is no doubt that Mubarak and Netanyahu discussed those "elements" and their "agents" when they met last week at Sharm al Sheikh. Mubarak called the atmosphere during the discussions "sincere and constructive."

Both men understand the nature and extent of the threat that Iran poses to their respective countries. The subject will have a high priority on the list of subjects they will, in turn, discuss with the American president when they meet with him this month.

There is, of course, the subject of the potential deadly fallout from Iran's nuclear ambitions, too…

Hebrew manuscripts in Vatican library

In its efforts to destroy Judaism, the Catholic church has used many methods, including the confiscation and burning of Jewish holy books. After succeeding to destroy hundreds of thousands of sacred Jewish books, there are still some 800 Hebrew manuscripts in the Vatican library.

In 1987, 57 of them travelled to various American cities as an exhibit. The Church described the exhibit as a "cultural cross-fertilization" of Christians and Jews during the Middle Ages. This lie was attacked as the fabrication it is by those who knew the manuscripts' history.

A committee of knowledgeable Jews asked the Church to return the manuscripts to the Jewish people and give them to Israel's national library. It has been more than 20 years since this request was made, and the Vatican has never responded. Major Jewish American leaders, including Seymour Reich, Elie Wiesel and Rabbi Emanuel Rackman, supported the committee. Israel's Institute of Manuscripts has published a report showing that the largest part of the 800 works originated in a part of Germany where they were seized after a pogrom. One of the Catholic rulers in Germany presented them to the Vatican. If the Vatican believes that their claims for certain lands in and around Jerusalem are to be taken seriously by Israel, they must first signal their sincerity by returning these 800 manuscripts to the Jewish people.

Palestinians and the Jewish state

The Palestinian refusal to recognize Israel as a Jewish state, represents the fundamental Arab/Muslim position ("Abbas won't recognize Israel as a Jewish state," CJN, April 30). Why will the Palestinians not accept Israel as part of a peace accord? For the Palestinians/Arabs to agree to this is to admit that they no longer consider the founding of the State of Israel 61 years ago to have been illegitimate.

If Israel enters an accord without insisting on such recognition, it will be in for a rude awakening in the future. Israel will continue to live as a Jewish state, albeit a much smaller, endangered, and paranoid one. Its new neighbour, its internal Arab citizenry, and no small part of the Arab world at large will, amid strained relations, continue to charge that Israel is a racist state. After all, to be a particularistic Jewish state violates the very essence of democracy. And the Arab world insists that Israel, though certainly not itself, must live by quintessential democratic principles.

Israel must resist the deceptive and dangerous suasion of "friends" who would have Israel believe that it can achieve peace without recognition, even as accords are signed with a temporary, bogus governing body composed of two hostile rivals, one sworn to Israel's destruction.

Diaspora needs more pressing

Without meaning any disrespect to Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, I would like to explain why I will not be making aliyah any time soon ("We're making aliyah and you should, too," CJN, May 7). I have a very simple criterion for deciding where is best to live. This criterion is not about where is most comfortable for me, nor is it related to what location offers me the most intense spiritual experiences. Rather, I ask myself the question of where can I be of greatest assistance to the Jewish people. I try never to ask what a location can offer me, but what I can give to it. At this juncture of Jewish history, where assimilation and apathy are rampant in the Diaspora, and even in our own community of Toronto, I know with certainty that this is the place where the battle for Jewish values will be fought most fiercely. I will not throw off that burden of responsibility so readily.

Day school funding

The May 7 edition of The CJN featured a photograph of a choir of a local Jewish day school being greeted by Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty at a ceremony at Queen's Park, at an event organized by the Yad Vashem Society to honour a group of Holocaust survivors ("Premier performance"). The caption stated that the premier shook hands with all of the students. Perhaps this is an indication that the premier has recanted from his harsh, vitriolic statements against faith-based education made during the last election campaign and is finally prepared to figure out a creative way to redress the longstanding, provincially sponsored unfairness toward the funding of non-Catholic faith-based schools in Ontario. If the premier has not changed his ways, then both the school involved and the sponsoring organization should have avoided falling into the trap that the photo-op provided. The irony of the juxtaposition of concern for the Jewish past with the thwarting of the Jewish future in Ontario is just too much for the hard-pressed Jewish day school community of Ontario to bear.

The Obama-Netanyahu meeting

Time for straight talk

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

Before the negotiations begin, Israel and the United States have to get the negotiations out of the way. U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu were to meet in Washington this week, culminating a period of coded back and forth messages on Iran and on resuming Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

When they meet, the two leaders and their advisers will likely try to break the code and set red lines for each side: Israel on Iran, the United States on Palestinian statehood.

David Makovsky, a senior scholar with the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said it was critical that each side make clear how far it will go toward meeting the other side's expectations.

"Each side should say what they cannot do, but they have to identify explicitly where they can say, 'Yes we can,'" he said.

Josh Block, the spokesperson for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), said the sides were set up for a "smooth visit."

"This is the first conversation at the highest levels between two very close allies," he said. "It's an opportunity for two leaders to build on existing personal rapport and to chart a unified course."

Another pro-Israel insider questioned whether the sides had actually managed to reach that point yet, suggesting the mutual pronouncements on the critical issues were still vague and lacking in the concrete details needed for policy foundation.

Insiders in both administrations, off the record, credit the other side with making the right noises.

Although the Obama administration has not outlined its Iran policy yet, Israeli officials say they are pleased with the signals coming from the White House, including Obama's extension of existing sanctions and backing in the Congress from Obama's Democratic party allies for toughened measures, which the president can use as a sword of Damocles should Iran resist his diplomatic outreach.

Even better from the Israeli point of view, is that the Obama administration has extracted a commitment from Russia to indefinitely suspend its delivery of the S-300 anti-missile system, which would have posed a serious threat to Israel's capacity to target Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program. Delivery of the system, according to U.S. and Israeli thinking, would have served as a disincentive for Iran to dismantle its nuclear program.

It helps that Dennis Ross, the Obama administration official shaping the Iran strategy, toured the region recently accompanied by military officials as well as diplomats. That was seen as a tangible sign that the Obama administration is serious when it says that nothing, including the military option, is off the table when it comes to containing Iran's weapons plans.

Meanwhile, Obama administration officials say Netanyahu has shown seriousness about accommodating Obama's push for renewed talks with the Palestinians. At last week's AIPAC conference, the Israeli leader retreated from campaign promises to focus only on Palestinian economic development, saying he placed equal importance on the security and political tracks.

Under Netanyahu, Israeli officials also are tamping down skepticism about U.S.-led efforts to bolster Palestinian security forces.

Gen. Keith Dayton, the U.S. general who heads the effort, last week said he felt the program now had "Israel's respect," and he was ready to almost double the number of personnel from 1,600 to 3,100. That, he said, would "reduce the IDF [Israel Defence Forces] footprint in the West Bank." Notably, AIPAC has signed onto U.S. efforts to provide the funds for the program.

Last week, ahead of his Obama summit, Netanyahu met with two regional allies that the United States considers critical in advancing peace with the Palestinians: Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Jordanian King Abdullah II.

"We wish to expand this peace first and foremost with our Palestinian neighbours," Netanyahu said last week at his meeting with Mubarak in Sharm al Sheikh after effusively praising the Egyptian leader. "We want to see Israelis and Palestinians living together with the prospect of peace, security and prosperity."

The problem is that communication between Israel and the United States in symbols – and not through frank exchanges – has in the past created misunderstandings that hamper co-operation. Over the years, Israel's understanding of a settlement freeze has often been much more flexible than that of the United States – including, at times, annexing territory adjacent to settlements. This has sometimes fostered bitter feelings between the two.

In recent weeks, there have been similar tensions because of a failure on both sides to make parameters clear. Netanyahu's government has suggested it is committed to Palestinian statehood by re-committing to the seven-year-old "road map" peace plan, but has not said so outright. That has led to frequent and emphatic commitments to statehood from Obama officials.

Conversely, the failure by the Obama administration to specify what it will do should diplomatic outreach to Iran fail has sparked a flood of leaks in the Israeli press about Israeli government anxieties over whether Israel might one day need to go it alone in facing Iran. The vacuum has led Israelis to wonder whether routine statements from U.S. officials about wanting every nuclear state to join the non-proliferation treaty mean that the Obama administration is taking aim at Israel's nuclear program.

Such questions need not be answered in the light of day, but should be addressed, even if Netanyahu and Obama need to clear the room of advisers to do it, said Makovsky, who has just co-authored a book with Ross on past failures in Middle East peacemaking titled Myths, Illusions and Peace.

Israelis watching

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

Start worrying. Details to follow.

It's an old joke about Jewish telegrams. And, according to Hebrew University political science professor Peter Medding, it's also a way to understand the jitters that some Israelis had as their new prime minister headed for the United States for his first White House meeting with President Barack Obama.

"What journalists and TV talking heads say, one ought to take with a grain of salt. There is an underlying fundamentally strong relationship between the United States and Israel," said Medding, a specialist in Israeli politics, cautioning against a seeming air of apprehension.

That said, he added that "with a new administration come fears it will be different, the sense that there is a new king who might make different policies, and people want to know which way America is going."

A recent poll indicates Israelis tend to be fond of U.S. President Barack Obama as a leader, but are unsure of what to make of his overtures to Arab countries, including Iran, and his judgment on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

A joint Bar-Ilan University-Anti-Defamation League survey published this month, found that 60 per cent of Israelis have a favourable view of Obama, with only 14 per cent registering unfavourable opinions.

But only slightly more than a third of the respondents said that Obama was friendly or very friendly toward Israel – approximately half the number who did when the same question was asked of then-president George W. Bush in a 2007 survey. And those surveyed were divided evenly on the question of whether or not Obama has good judgment when it comes to the Israeli-Palestinian track.

Eytan Gilboa, the Bar-Ilan political science professor who helped oversee the survey, noted that young people and religious Jews, especially haredim, tended to be more suspicious of Obama than other Israelis, according to the poll.

"The attitudes of the young people did surprise me," said Gilboa, who speculated that their thinking reflects a hardening of the political outlook of the young, many of whom supported the nationalist Avigdor Lieberman (now foreign minister) in the recent elections.

"Perhaps young people are more cynical about politics. They want clear messages," he said, "and are not impressed by the charisma and rhetoric of Obama."

Eti Doron, 50, who owns a toy store on a busy Tel Aviv street, told JTA that she was taken aback "with his reaching out to the Arab fundamentalist world.

"I know someone has to take off the gloves first to see what might happen," she said, "but when I see the headlines, I think, 'OK, maybe he's not so pro-Israel.'"

Israeli commentators and officials have been voicing concerns that Obama and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu could be heading toward a clash if they don't find some common ground.

Obama has made it clear that a Palestinian state is a priority and that he wants to involve moderate Arab countries in the process. Netanyahu, who had a stormy relationship with the Bill Clinton White House the last time he was prime minister, has yet to say definitively where he stands on the issue.

Recent statements from Washington – whether about Israel's nuclear program or suggestions that progress on the Israeli-Palestinian track might be linked to progress on ending Iran's nuclear ambitions – are also causing concern in some Israeli circles.

"I think that there is a sense of suspicion, a sense Washington is trying to create tension between Israel and the U.S., and I am very sorry about it," said Yakov Achimeir, a veteran Israeli journalist and commentator.

But he did not expect a confrontation in Obama and Netnayahu's meeting.

"It's not in the interest of an American president that his first meeting with the new Israeli prime minister will end with a clash," Achimeir said. "I think there will be an exchange of views, and I don't think they will reach agreement on every point, but I think it will give both of them more time to think about each other's views and then come with more concrete ideas."

Akiva Eldar, chief political columnist for the daily Ha'aretz agrees that the change in tone from Washington has taken Israelis off-guard.

"I would say that Israelis have been spoiled in the last eight years by George W. Bush, who sent a message of 'you can get away with anything, you can do whatever you want in Lebanon or Gaza, and you don't have to take the president of the United States too seriously,'" he told JTA.

Eldar thinks Israelis have yet to comprehend the nuances of recent U.S. behaviour that he says spell out the new political climate, including Obama's invitation to Jordan's King Abdullah II as the first Middle East leader to visit the White House (he was in Washington in April) and the president's upcoming trip to Egypt without plans to also visit Israel.

"Such acts would once have been considered a slap in the face, but nowadays the majority of Israelis don't really believe in what we all call the peace process or the two-state solution or the Arab League initiative or whatever Obama believes," Eldar said. "They believe he is naive… that either he does not know enough about the Arabs, or if he knows – and this is the worst-case scenario – he should be considered pro-Arab and we should not take him too seriously."

You are what you dream

"You are what you eat" is a well-worn cliché. We construct our identities out of bits of quotidian life – from our culinary style, fashion sense, and literary interests. We are what we eat, wear, befriend and read.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

On the other hand, dreams are considered too ephemeral to warrant serious attention. The word "daydream" connotes a meaningless diversion. However, dreams are actually a major force in determining our identities.

You are what you dream. Students with dreams of playing basketball will concentrate less on their grades, comparatively, than students dreaming of careers in astrophysics. In all likelihood, the aspiring athlete will focus on sports, and the aspiring scientist on academics. Dreams may be about the future, but they affect our current behavior profoundly.

That's why dreams are the basis of repentance. Repentance requires the penitent to resolve to improve in the future. Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik notes that several philosophers have questioned the value of these resolutions. They argue that either the person will improve in the future, or they won't. What difference does a resolution make?

Rabbi Soloveitchik explains that our vision of the future is critical to our present. A sincere resolution or a powerful dream can transform immediately.

Indeed, dreams have transformed Jewish history. In exile, Jews were strangers in strange lands, despised and oppressed. It would seem ridiculous for members of this abject minority to have any sense of optimism. However, to the poor Jew living in a hovel inside a ghetto, the dream of redemption offered a lifeline. Even if everyone treated him as a cursed subhuman, the poor Jew could straighten his back and dream that he was only a few steps from the land of milk and honey.

These dreams of redemption not only maintained the Jewish connection to Israel; they transformed the lives of every Jew. By looking forward to the redemption, the Jew could maintain his dignity in the face of hatred.

At times, it was dangerous for Jews to dream. In 1968, Boris Kochubievsky wrote an open letter to the leadership of the Soviet Union stating: "I want to live in Israel… This is my dream… I will go to the homeland of my ancestors, even if it means going by foot."

Boris was thrown in jail. But he went to prison with his dreams intact. Today, 40 years later, the situation has changed. The Soviet Union can only be found in history books, but Boris can be found in Israel.

Boris' dreams changed world history. And we all need to learn how to dream like Boris, because in the end, you are what you dream.

Canadians uphold a proud human rights legacy

Canada stood tall – dare we say, glorious and free? – during the recent Durban Review debacle in Geneva, thanks to Prime Minister Stephen Harper's pre-emptive strike in boycotting the so-called UN anti-racism conference long before anyone else did.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Canada is now spearheading the push to reform the United Nations, while challenging liberal and autocratic hypocrisy worldwide. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's bigotry at an anti-racism conference defined Durban II as yet another festival of despots bashing the West and Israel. But more significant was the alliance forged beyond the conference halls between pro-Israel and human rights activists frustrated that the UN's Israel obsession hurts human rights.

Canadians such as MP and former Liberal justice minister Irwin Cotler and the executive director of UN Watch, Hillel Neuer, were essential marriage brokers in building this friendship, demanding the UN live up to its ideals and condemn the world's true human rights abusers.

During the first World Conference Against Racism, held in 2001 in Durban, South Africa, the streets filled with anti-Zionists shouting vitriolic anti-Semitic slogans that Adolf Hitler didn't finish the job. Some human rights groups and pro-Israel groups began working to reform the UN human rights mechanisms.

Not surprisingly, Canadians such as Cotler and Neuer were crucial in launching this initiative. Many Canadians maintain great faith in the UN's founding ideals and are proud that John Peters Humphrey, a longtime McGill University law professor, drafted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Cotler, on leave as a law professor from McGill, is a world-renowned human rights crusader who has spent decades criss-crossing the globe defending the oppressed, including Nelson Mandela and Natan Sharansky. Neuer was Cotler's student at McGill, continuing this McGill – and Canadian – tradition.

When the UN started preparations to host a review conference in Durban, Neuer was particularly well-placed to head off another hatefest. Based in Geneva as the executive director of UN Watch, he has frequently highlighted the UN's anti-Israel obsession and its hypocrisy in letting dictatorships dominate the Human Rights Council. Working with various organizations in shifting coalitions – including its parent organization the American Jewish Committee, as well as NGO Monitor and B'nai Brith International, Freedom House and Freedom Now – UN Watch helped redirect the process.

Effective lobbying of the Ford Foundation and others cut off funds that NGOs would have used to replicate the Durban I sideshow. The UN, embarrassed by Durban I, agreed to shift the venue of this year's conference to Geneva, where the UN and Swiss police could better control events. Western diplomats worked to moderate the Durban Review declaration. In this environment, Canada's bold decision to boycott galvanized the forces trying to right Durban's wrongs.

As a result, in Geneva, there were no angry mass rallies against Israel. UN Watch and dozens of other groups hosted conferences and side meetings, giving dissidents and victims from Iran, Egypt, Cuba, Burma, Rwanda and Darfur opportunities to tell their tales. The participants denounced the United Nations for allowing oppressors such as Libya to chair the Human Rights Council, and for ignoring real abuses in their zeal to demonize Israel.

The largest demonstration appears to have been a festive gathering of 2,000 to 3,000 Israel supporters on the conference's third day. Joining one American, one Italian, one Israeli, and one French politician on the podium were two of us from McGill, Cotler and I, as well as Harper's parliamentary secretary – and personal representative to the side conferences – MP Pierre Poilievre. The MC, David Harris, of the American Jewish committee, joked that at these events, Canadians rarely outnumber Americans. May we always compete to lead the way on these issues.

"Please use your liberty to promote ours," Soe Aung, a Burmese dissident, begged at the Geneva Summit for Human Rights, Tolerance and Democracy, which celebrated 60 years of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the Genocide Convention. While the first Durban sideshow embodied the UN at its worst, the second Durban side conferences tried to meet Aung's challenge.

If the UN starts to reform, history will honour the Conservative Harper – with his Liberal colleague Cotler – for not only saving the United Nations, but also for helping to save many liberal activists from their own moral myopia.

What I'm still learning from my mother

I loved the movie 50 First Dates with Adam Sandler. Sandler plays a guy who falls for a beautiful woman, but with a catch: she suffers from short-term memory loss. Since she can never remember anything, he has to romance her anew every single day. The movie has a magical happy ending: he makes her a videotape that she watches every morning, to remind her of who he is, and who she is, and they live happily ever after.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Toronto

But my mother's quickly fading memory loss won't have a happy ending. Her neshamah shines through the sometimes-vacant moments, and her smile lights up the room when I walk in, but she isn't sure why I'm there or who those nice boys with me are. When she smiles, I still see my mother as she once was, a long time ago.

She's my mother, but she's now my child, too. It's a cruel reversal.

Daily triumphs are small: I get excited when she can still ask a lucid question or when we have a two-sentence conversation. I feel like the mother of a newborn baby: She walked today! She said banana! She kissed me! I sometimes feel unconditional love for her rushing over me like waves, the sweet, patient love of a mother for a toddler. At other times, I feel uncontrollable sadness, like a mother watching her child continually stumble and fall.

There are some advantages to not having short-term memory. Fights and grudges don't last. You live in the here and now. I am learning a lot through this process, and I document the lessons in the hopes they will be comforting to me later and helpful to those who may find themselves in my position now. I hope I can carry these lessons from her dementia with me throughout my life.

1) There's no use arguing about anything – she won't remember and it doesn't bother her. 2) There's no use being aggravated because she lost something – she doesn't remember having it and she's not upset that it's gone. 3) Slow down: don't rush in, say hello, and rush out – time doesn't mean all that much, she can't follow when you speak quickly, and your stress gives her stress. 4) Keep it simple. She's happy with little things for a very short while: going out for dinner means more than the actual reason we're going out, which she can't remember. 5) Keep your expectations reasonable. Don't do things that are meaningful to you – do things that are meaningful to her. 6) Just sitting and holding hands is fine. 7) Don't correct her. It only embarrasses her and aggravates you. 8) Each day is different, so take it as it comes. Some will be good and some will be bad. It is what it is.

Ours is a religion of memory. It's incumbent upon the Jew to remember. But what we pray for is to be remembered: to live in such a way as to leave a legacy. To be remembered is to not disappear. To be remembered is to be validated. To be remembered is to be present even when absent. To be remembered is to be re-membered – to be a member once again of a community. My mom will be remembered even if she doesn't remember.

To remember and to be remembered are precious gifts – but they're different gifts. The first we can't control. The brain will do its own thing, regardless of what we want. No matter how many mementos and snapshots we paste into scrapbooks and photo albums, as much as we vow to "never forget," eventually, one way or another, we will. In the words of the Psalmist, "We fly away."

In 50 First Dates, even love can't reverse a brain injury, and it won't reverse my mom's dementia, either. But to be remembered is altogether possible, and it's what we can hope for.

The Kirshner File

Comic books were virtually created by Jews

Comic books, an iconic manifestation of pop American culture, were virtually created by Jewish Americans. "Jews almost single-handedly built the industry from the ground up, and Jewish involvement in it continues to be felt," said Arie Kaplan, a New York-based cartoonist whose work appears on the Cartoon Network and PBS Kids.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

And he should know. For about the past five years, Kaplan has immersed himself in this topic, plumbing its depths in an effort to ascertain the connection between comic books and Jews.

"I took my quest seriously," he said. Indeed he has. Kaplan's lavishly illustrated book, From Krakow to Krypton (The Jewish Publication Society), which he promoted recently in Toronto, is a definitive and accessible work, highlighting the contributions of such Jewish figures as Maxwell Gaines, Jerry Siegel, Bob Kane, Stan Lee, Jack Kirby and Will Eisner.

Gaines (Ginsberg), a former teacher and failed novelty salesman, was effectively the creator of the comic book. Siegel, a kid from Cleveland, and his Toronto-born collaborator, Jerry Shuster, dreamed up the greatest fictional hero of all time, Superman.

Kane (Kahn) and Lee (Lieber) respectively invented Batman and Spiderman. Kirby (Kurtzberg) devised Captain America and the Incredible Hulk, while Eisner gave us the Black Condor and Uncle Sam.

These cartoonists laboured during the golden age of comic books, from 1938 to 1952, when their language was formed and they started to differentiate themselves, in style and content, from newspaper strips.

Many of the cartoonists were penniless kids, underpaid "wage slaves" who never received proper financial compensation for their efforts and naively signed away all rights to their work to their publishers, according to Kaplan, the son of an architect and a Jewish school principal.

And a lot of them were Jewish in an era when anti-Semitic discrimination in employment, particularly at advertising agencies and publishing houses, was quite common.

Gaines, who launched the industry and transformed it into a thriving business, stumbled into it after reading old Sunday funnies in his mother's attic in the Bronx. Savouring their lush artwork and colourful narrative, Gaines hit upon an idea whose time had come. If he enjoyed these strips, maybe other readers would as well.

Newspaper comic strips already had been repackaged in book and magazine form as far back as the 1890s. "Gaines' main innovation lay in realizing that there was a business to be made out of these comic strip reprints, that people would buy these comic reprint magazines on a regular basis," Kaplan writes in From Krakow to Krypton, which is dedicated to his late Polish-born grandmother, Adele Pomeranc.

Fired up by the concept, Gaines contacted his friend, Harry Wildenberg, an employee in the sales department of Eastern Color Printing, the company that printed many Sunday newspaper comics sections.

In 1934, Eastern Color Printing published Famous Funnies, the first American retail comic book to be distributed to the public rather than folded inside a Sunday newspaper. Famous Funnies, which did not turn a profit until its seventh edition, lasted well into the mid-1950s, reaching a peak circulation of 400,000.

Kaplan says that the emerging comic book industry quickly became one of the few commercial success stories of the Great Depression.

By 1941, the United States supported more than 30 comic book publishers, producing 150 different comic books a month with combined sales of 15 million and a readership of 60 million.

Unlike pulp magazines, which catered to adults, comic books mainly appealed to kids. And the comic book hero they doted on in droves was Superman, a caped muscleman in red and blue tights whose alter ego was the milquetoast newspaper reporter Clark Kent.

Rejected by major New York dailies as being too fantastic, even for juvenile readers, Superman was, in Kaplan's words, "crudely drawn and broadly written."

Gaines, however, was impressed by the Superman character and convinced DC Comics to buy it. The first Superman comic appeared in 1938. From that point onward, the Man of Steel from the planet Krypton never looked back. He was serialized in movies and radio shows.

"During the Depression, Superman represented hope and optimism," explained Kaplan, whose own comic book credits include the miniseries Speed Racer, the Cartoon Network Action Pack and the Papercutz series Tales from the Crypt.

"Today, he represents the same things. Look at us as a country. We're in a recession. We're worried about terrorism. All kinds of crazy things are happening. We need action heroes."

To Kaplan and some scholars, Superman is the ultimate metaphor for the Jewish experience. The last survivor of an extinct planet decimated in a Holocaust-like catastrophe, Superman is something of a refugee/ immigrant in a strange land. As for Clark Kent, he is a bookish and bespectacled nerd, perhaps a stereotypical Jew.

The comic book industry probably reached its apogee during World War II, when comics practically became "regulation army equipment" among American soldiers. Superman and other comic book heroes were thrown into the fray, and from 1941 to 1945, he battled a legion of Nazi agents. Legend has it that Germany's propaganda minister, Joseph Goebbels, denounced him as a Jew.

In fact, Superman was not Jewish, as Kaplan observes. "Wishing to prove to the gentile public that they were good Americans, Jewish comic book creators were careful to fashion superheroes who were super-Americans, characters who would not be perceived as either Jewish or belonging to any specific ethnicity."

According to Kaplan, Harvey Kurtzman, the founder of Mad magazine, which debuted in 1952 and reached its heyday in the 1960s and '70s, is one of the most influential figures in the comic book industry. "Mad was the first satirical comic book to address the nation's ills and challenge its sacred cows," he writes. "Mad poked fun at politics and beloved institutions," he added. "It was hugely important, influencing Saturday Night Live, the Onion and the Daily Show. I'd be very surprised if Jon Stewart – the host of the Daily Show – didn't read Mad as a kid."

Kaplan also admires Art Spiegelman, the son of Holocaust survivors and the creator of Maus, the first comic book to win a Pulitzer Prize. In 1986, Spiegelman expanded Maus, based on his father's experiences as a Holocaust survivor, into graphic novel format.

It was a watershed. Maus brought the graphic novel into mainstream exposure, noted Kaplan, who graduated from New York University with a degree in playwriting and wrote for a New York area sketch comedy troupe before segueing into comic book writing.

"It's just really good storytelling. Spiegelman tells you about the Holocaust without being didactic or sentimental. Nor is he afraid to portray his father as a deeply flawed person, which makes him a more sympathetic character."

Apart from Spiegelman, Kaplan also likes contemporary Jewish comic book writers/ cartoonists such as Harvey Pekar (American Splendor), Brian Michael Bendis (Secret Invasion and Jinx), Bill Gaiman (Sandman) and Chris Claremont (Kitty Pryde).

He is thrilled to be in such illustrious company. "I've had so much fun writing comic books. It's amazing I get paid for it."

USY region elects new board

Compiled by CJN Staff

USY's recent regional convention at Queen's University was attended by Kadimaniks (grades 5 to 7) and USYers (grades 8 to 12) of the organization's Eastern Canadian region United Synagogue Youth (ECRUSY).

During the May 7 to 10 convention, the attendees elected their 2009-10 regional executive board.

USY is the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, and Kadima is the middle-school affiliate. Kadimaniks and USYers from ECRUSY chapters in Ontario and Quebec attended the conference.

The theme of this year's convention, co-chaired by Daniel Hosiassohn and Jessie Schoenberg of Beth Jacob in Hamilton, was Olympiad 5769. Participants discussed the people they idolized and called heroes.

Tamara Rebick, youth chair of the Canadian region of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, who has completed 20 years of service with ECRUSY, spoke about the meaning of USY and community.

As social action and education are part of every convention, USYers and Kadimaniks discussed disability issues and raised more than $400 for charity.

They celebrated Tel Aviv's centennial, re-enacting the lottery of plots on the beach in Tel Aviv.

In addition to the activities related to the convention theme, there were late-night sessions on Conservative Judaism, ethics and organ donation.

Sarah Goldberg of Beth Jacob Synagogue, Hamilton, was elected president of the 2009-10 ECRUSY executive board, succeeding David Wallach of Shaar Shalom, Thornhill, Ont.

Also elected to the executive board were Israel affairs/executive vice-president Avital Sternin, B'nai Israel chapter, St. Catharines, Ont.; religion/education vice-president Joshua Seed, Beth David chapter, Toronto; social action/tikkun olam vice-president Emma Pascoe, Beth David chapter, Toronto; Sara Levine, Beth David chapter, Toronto; and Jacob Morris, Beth David chapter, Toronto.

Awards were presented to Beit Rayim Synagogue, Toronto, for chapter of the year; Beth Jacob, Hamilton, won the Eitz Hayyim for most improved chapter; and Stanley Roth, Beth David chapter, Toronto, won the Sharon Cole Memorial Merit Scholarship for his service to ECRUSY.

Maxwell Marmer, of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, will continue to serve as ECRUSY's international communications vice-president and David Wallach, also of Shaar Shalom, will co-chair 2009 the USY international convention in Chicago, from Dec. 27 to 31.

LAG B'OMER CELEBRATIONS: Kids and parents alike celebrated Lag b'Omer at Chabad of Markham young families' movie night and barbecue, held at the synagogue. The same evening, the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Ontario held a celebration for about 1,000 people at Earl Bales Park, which included music, a barbecue, a bonfire, and a clown and acrobat show for kids. 'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Friendship has no ulterior motive

By RABBI PHILIP SCHEIM

Shmerl offers another suggestion: "Instead of throwing it out, dear, let's give the chicken to Beryl, who can't afford to buy a chicken for Shabbat. That way, it won't go to waste, and we'll do a mitzvah."

And they do. Shabbat morning in shul, Shmerl learns that Beryl is home, very sick. Shmerl returns home, tells his wife that Beryl is sick, and announces his intention to visit him. "You know, bikur cholim, visiting the sick, is a very big mitzvah."

The next day, he visits Beryl. Next Shabbat, Shmerl returns to shul and again, Beryl isn't there. He enquires, and learns that Beryl has died. After services, he returns home, tells his wife and says he will attend the funeral the next day. "You know, attending a funeral is a very big mitzvah."

After the funeral, he tells his wife: "Let's go to Beryl's house to pay a shivah visit. You know, nichum aveilim, comforting the bereaved, is a great mitzvah."

They make the visit. Upon leaving the house, Shmerl turns to his wife and says: "You know, dear, it's amazing! From one lousy chicken, four mitzvot!"

Friends like Shmerl, sadly, are not hard to find. Too many supposed acts of friendship are motivated by self-interest. Shmerl derives satisfaction from the mitzvot he is able to fulfil at Beryl's expense, satisfaction that Beryl's untimely demise does nothing to dispel.

In Mishnah Avot, we learn that true love and friendship are defined by the absence of any ulterior motive. Such love is exemplified by the friendship between David and Jonathan. The special Haftorah read this Shabbat (Machar Chodesh, I Samuel 20), tells their story. Jonathan demonstrates his love for David by warning David of Saul's plans to kill him. In helping save David's life, Jonathan knows that he will lose the chance to be king after his father's death – the throne will go to the folk-hero David. The friendship pact between David and Jonathan at the conclusion of the Haftorah cements their friendship into eternity: "The Lord shall be between me and you, between my descendants and yours, forever."

The story of Shmerl mentions four mitzvot. What these mitzvot have in common is the absence of a brachah, a blessing. Nowhere in the mitzvot of charity, visiting the sick, burying the dead or comforting the bereaved do we recite a standard brachah formula. Perhaps this conscious omission of a blessing is to thwart those who would use other people's suffering for spiritual gain. Each of these four mitzvot involves human suffering. Far be it from us to derive spiritual reward from their fulfilment. Thus, no brachah. No blessing.

Selfless friendship in the extreme is reflected in the question asked of Rabbi Tzvi Hirsch Meisels in Auschwitz by a youth named Akiva Mann. Akiva's dear friend Moshe was selected for death. Akiva wanted the rabbi's permission to substitute himself for his friend, on the grounds that Moshe was a Torah prodigy, a far better student than he. Not only would his friend live (at least, for the moment), but the world of Torah learning would be better served.

One can only imagine the tears that Rabbi Meisels must have shed when refusing young Akiva's request. Notwithstanding Moshe's greater learning achievements, Akiva's life was just as precious. The trade could not be permitted. But since the time of Jonathan and David, a more selfless act of friendship likely had not occurred, until that of Akiva on behalf of Moshe.

Rabbi Philip Scheim is the spiritual leader of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue in Toronto.

Shavuot and shalom bayit

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The holiday of Shavuot marks several events. It marked the start of the harvest and it's also the time that the Torah was offered to the Jewish people and unanimously accepted. One of the most beautiful and unique moments in our history is that instance when we all answered a question with one opinion and one voice. We all committed ourselves to Torah.

In many instances, the revelation at Sinai and the acceptance of the Torah is likened to a marriage ceremony. We stood at Sinai as a bride stands under her chupah with her groom. The Torah was offered as the marriage contract, and we accepted it, just as a bride is offered her ketubah and must accept. She walks around her groom seven times to weave their souls together, and the name of this holiday is Shavuot, which means "weeks," units of seven days. There are many parallels that build the image of a union of intimacy and legal bond, which constitutes both a marriage and the Jewish covenant with God.

But there's also a beautiful subtlety that exists within the texts we read, as well as an often-forgotten detail of Jewish history.

During the holiday of Shavuot, we read the book of Ruth. It's the story of a daring and compassionate Moabite woman named Ruth who bonds with her Israelite mother-in-law, Naomi, and ultimately becomes the first official convert to Judaism. Through the story of Ruth, the rabbis will subsequently build a formalized model of conversion.

An interesting theme also weaves through the text of Ruth concerning the women's loss of the men in their lives and the unusual circumstances that bring about a union between Ruth and Naomi's distant relative by marriage, Boaz. The fact that Ruth comes from the nation of Moab, along with many parallel and unusual words in the text, subtly leads us back to the book of Genesis and the origins of the nation of Moab. These origins lie within the story of Sodom and the family of Lot.

Lot is Abraham's nephew and the family's adopted son. He is raised by Abraham and Sarah and later chooses to leave the family and establish himself in Sodom. We meet him again when God sends angels to destroy Sodom and save Lot and his family. Only Lot and two of his daughters survive and are living secluded within a cave. The daughters, believing that the world has been destroyed and that there are no men left, decide to do something that's unfathomable. They intoxicate their father and lie with him so as to continue the human race. Each becomes pregnant and delivers a boy, one named Ammon and one named Moab.

At the conclusion of all these events, Abraham moves away, and the sages conclude that Abraham distances himself from his son, Lot, and the family splits up as a result of these women.

Ruth is a descendant of the nation of Moab, the nation that began within that cave. We are aware that we read the book of Ruth on Shavuot, because it's the moment when every Jew accepts Torah, whether they're a Jew by birth or a Jew by choice, and Ruth gives us the model of a Jew by choice. But there is also the subtlety of family images that wind through Shavuot – the "marriage" of the Jewish people and God, as well as the bonding of Ruth and Naomi and the unusual circumstances of the marriage of Ruth and Boaz.

The text informs us that Ruth, the Moabite woman, will ultimately give us the Davidic line. King David will come from Ruth's grandchild, and we are struck by the irony that the line of David, the messianic line, results from what happened in that cave.

But the historic detail that's often missed is that a descendant of Ammon, the other son from the cave, will likewise play a crucial role. Naamah, the Ammonite, will marry King Solomon, David's son, and it's through that marriage that the messianic line will continue. It's hardly a coincidence that two women, each descendants of the daughters of Lot, are crucial to the Jewish messianic legacy.

By bringing these female descendants back into the narrative of Jewish history, the original family of Abraham, Sarah and their son, Lot, are finally reconciled. The value of shalom bayit, peace within our home, is such a core value in Judaism that we are subtly taught that no family rift should ever be left unhealed, that peace and reconciliation must be achieved even if it takes generations.

At Shavuot, we celebrate the commitment to marriage, Torah and Jewish unity, and by remembering Ruth and Naamah, we understand how important peace is to bond these elements together.

As the midrash says: "The Holy One said: since Israel has learned to hate strife and love peace, so that they are now encamped as a single camp, the time has come for Me to give them My Torah."

Masada symbolizes the spirit of Israel

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

No other archeological excavation captivated the imagination of Israelis, and indeed the world, like the excavations of Herod's desert palace and fortress at Masada. Masada came to symbolize the spirit and determination of the new state of Israel that had been created a scant 15 years before the excavation.

The renowned Yigael Yadin, who had made a name for himself both archeologically and militarily, directed the excavations. As a young man barely 30 years old, Yadin had been chief of staff of the Haganah during the War of Independence. Afterward he completed his doctorate, writing his thesis on the subject of one of the Dead Sea Scrolls, which his father, Eliezer Sukenik, had obtained for Israel.

Yadin himself had played a role in obtaining the group of scrolls that his father had failed to secure. He was able to get the remainder of these priceless documents, which had eluded his father in 1947, in 1954. It is an amazing story involving intrigue and subterfuge spanning two continents and seven years. Ironically, it was an ad in of all places, the Wall Street Journal, that led to their return to Israel and the Shrine of the Book, where they are now housed.

But Yadin's archeological reputation was secured when he headed the major excavations in the late 1950s at the biblical site of Hazor, located at the entrance to the Upper Galilee as one ascends from Lake Kinnereth (the Sea of Galilee). It was the excavation at Hazor that first allowed Yadin to combine the logistical skills, which he had acquired as commander of the Haganah, with those of his chosen profession in archeology.

It was at Hazor that Yadin assembled a top-notch archeological team whose individual members would dominate archeology in Israel for a generation. From that group also emerged Yadin's right-hand man and architect, Immanuel Dunayevsky. Dunayevsky would play an important role in the upcoming excavations at Masada

At Masada, Yadin perfected the well-oiled archeological machine that he had put together at Hazor. The excavation at Masada was unique from a number of standpoints. Firstly, it got its labour force in a way that would revolutionize subsequent excavations in Israel and eventually other parts of the world as well.

It was while he was in England on sabbatical, in 1961, that Yadin put out the word by means of an advertisement in the London Times that he was looking for volunteers for his upcoming excavations at Masada. He was surprised by the overwhelming response.

The excavation at Masada was a logistical nightmare. The top of the site was virtually inaccessible to heavy machinery. It was here that Yadin took advantage of his army connections by using helicopters to transport equipment to the summit.

The discoveries were equally spectacular. Yadin found the lots with the names of the defenders that Josephus said were used to determine the order of their suicides. Among these lots was that of their leader, Ben Yair. Altogether more than 700 ostraca (pot shards inscribed with writing) were found written in Hebrew, Aramaic and even Greek and Latin. There were also manuscript fragments found that corresponded to those from Qumran, where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found. This led scholars to believe that some of the inhabitants from Qumran may have taken refuge on Masada after the Romans destroyed their habitation.

There is no doubt that Masada has served as an inspiration to the State of Israel. Youths go there for their bar mitzvahs, while units of the Israel Defence Forces go to Masada for their graduation ceremonies. It is an unwritten law that "Masada shall not fall again," giving us another example of how the Past marches Forward in Israel.

Rumours and hoaxes, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Last week, we looked at how to spot rumours and hoaxes that are circulated – and re-circulated – on the Internet. Now it's time to play a little quiz. See if you can determine which of the rumours making the rounds are true, which are false and which were once true but are now outdated.

Rumours

1. The United Kingdom removed Holocaust education from its curriculum because it offended the Muslim population.
2. YouTube has been removing videos posted by the Israel Defence Forces.
3. An Egyptian cleric is calling for a boycott of Starbucks because he says its logo portrays Queen Esther.
4. Simon Cowell used an anti-Jewish slur on the TV show American Idol.
5. Signing an online petition is an effective way to get Google to remove offensive search results.
6. Sexpert Dr. Ruth Westheimer served as a sniper in Israel.
8. Norwegian supermarkets place labels on Israeli products to assist individuals who wish to boycott Israeli products.
9. In response to Mel Gibson's film The Passion of the Christ, Steven Spielberg is planning to direct a film about the Crusades.

The Truth

1. False. Holocaust education is mandatory in British schools and continues to be part of the national curriculum. [tinyurl.com/rumor01]
2. False. [tinyurl.com/rumor02] The IDF spokesperson continues to maintain a page on the popular video site. [tinyurl. com/ rumor03]
3. True. Most see the logo as mermaid but not Egyptian cleric Safwat Higazi, who is calling for a boycott of the chain. [tinyurl.com/rumor04]
4. False. E-mails claim that Cowell used the word "Jewped" in reference to a contestant being allowed to continue by the other three judges. The Anti-Defamation League reviewed the video and determined the word Cowell used was "duped," after one of the judges spoke positively about the contestant. [tinyurl. com/rumor05]
5. False. The ADL recommends against it. Names on online petitions have been copied and posted to anti-Semitic websites, where offensive commentary has been written about those signing the petition. The ADL recommends writing to Google directly to express concerns rather than signing a petition. It also says that Google has been very responsive about removing hate sites that rank high in its results. [tinyurl.com/rumor06]
6. True. In 1944, Westheimer, then Karola Ruth Siegel, 16, joined the Haganah as a lookout and sniper. [tinyurl.com/rumor07]
7. Outdated. The automaker did omit Israel several years ago and has apologized. "As a car manufacturer we are not involved in Middle East politics, do not support any of the given political attitudes and did not aim to make any kind of political statement." [tinyurl.com/rumor08]
8. False. The Norwegian Jewish community has inspected supermarkets and has found no evidence of singling out Israeli products beyond normal "country of origin" identification that applies to all products. [tinyurl.com/rumor09]
9. False. Calling it a "vicious, totally fabricated story," Spielberg representative Martin Levy said that "nothing could be further from the truth. Anyone who knows Mr. Spielberg would know that he is dedicated to doing what he can to rid the world of hatred and intolerance wherever it exists." [tinyurl.com/rumor10]
10. True. Powell's family "moved to a largely Jewish neighbourhood in the Bronx, where Powell picked up some proficiency in Yiddish from his neighbours and through working at Sickser's baby equipment store in his teenage years." When Powell was asked about his Yiddish skills at an American Israel Public Affairs Committee conference, he responded, "Well, yes, I do understand a bissel." [tinyurl.com/rumor11]

So how did you do?

0-3 correct. You understand a bissel about hoaxes.

4-6 correct. Rumour has it you're learning.

7-8 correct. You're almost an urban legend yourself.

9-10 correct. You're an e-mail maven!

Now that Netivot HaTorah Day School is celebrating its 25th anniversary, people understand that "it's not an experiment.

"We're part of the landscape," school president Dov Rosenblum told The CJN. Since he became involved as a parent some 14 years ago, he has seen Netivot become "a mature school."

The coeducational modern Orthodox, Zionist day school runs from nursery to Grade 8, and has 550 students, most of them located in Netivot's building in Thornhill, where it moved in 1993.

As a modern Orthodox school, one of its main precepts is "having a relationship with all Jews, and with the greater world," said Rosenblum.

On May 25, a 25th anniversary dinner will be held at the Paramount Banquet Hall honouring the memory of Avrom Silver, a school founder. It will be the culmination of a series of events honouring the anniversary.

Proceeds will go to an endowment fund in Silver's memory.

Earlier this year Netivot reunions were held in Toronto and Israel, where about 16 per cent of the school's almost 900 graduates have moved, according to statistics provided by the school's director of development, Alan Steinfeld.

At least 15 alumni serve in the IDF, he added. Alumni can also be found in the fields of medicine, business, science, law and accounting, Steinfeld said.

Steinfeld, who describes himself as Netivot's resident historian, said that he and his wife felt "it was worth taking the chance" of sending their oldest son to Netivot's first junior kindergarten class, held at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue. He was among 42 JK, SK and Grade 1 students that year, and the first of the four Steinfeld children to attend Netivot.

"We really liked the hashgafah [religious philosophy] of the school. It suited our personal hashgafah," said Steinfeld, who has been on staff since 1987.

At Beth David, Steinfeld recalls, the gym did double duty as a lunch room, and students sat at tables on wheels that had to be moved out of the way for gym class.

He added that, now that the school has its own building, it is able to have a basketball team and can offer other extracurricular activities that weren't previously available.

In the late 1980s, Steinfeld said, the school needed more classroom space, and the higher grades were housed at Temple Sinai.

Four years later, there was a third campus, located for a year at Thornhill's Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation.

"Certainly the growth of the school has been a phenomenal change," said Steinfeld.

For further information about the dinner, call Shaindy at 905-771-1234, ext. 25 or go to www.netivot.com/dinner.

Hillcrest preschool turns 80

By FRANCES KRAFT

Hillcrest Progressive School will celebrate its 80th anniversary with an onsite birthday bash on May 26 from 5 to 8 p.m.

Now a Jewish preschool in Toronto's Hoggs Hollow area, Hillcrest began its existence in 1929 as Ontario's first Jewish day school.

Associated Hebrew Schools – Toronto's oldest Jewish day school, which celebrated its centennial last year – began as a Talmud Torah and did not become a day school until the mid-1950s. Eitz Chaim, the second-oldest day school in the city, also started as a supplementary school, and became a day school in the 1940s.

Hillcrest Progressive School – "progressive" referring to modern educational philosophies – was originally located in a rented house on Christie Street. In 1934, it was chartered under the name of Central Jewish Institute, which is still the name of the entity that operates the school.

Hanna Shlesinger, 83, who taught three-year-olds at Hillcrest's current location from 1975 to 2002, told The CJN in a phone interview that some of her childhood friends attended the preschool's predecessor on Christie Street.

"I remember just that [the original school] was a wonderful place to be," Shlesinger said. "Everybody had a good time, plus the fact that they were learning something."

She recalled that the house had a turret on top, and said she believes it is now a private home.

After a few years on Christie Street, the school moved to 574 University Ave. in the early 1930s, according to information on its website. The University Avenue property was expropriated for the building of what is now Queen Elizabeth Hospital.

Hillcrest was in its own building on Avenue Road until 1955, when it moved to its current location.

Shlesinger, who taught at Holy Blossom Temple before joining Hillcrest, said one of the things that stood out for her about the preschool was that "warmth radiated when you opened the front door.

"It was a great place to work. So many teachers have been there for so long."

Hillcrest's principal, Queenie Spindel, has been with the school for 23 years. The Capetown native, who started as a nursery teacher, said most of the teachers have been with the school for more than 15 years.

"We have a special slogan – 'Every day is a special day' – and we truly believe it is," she said.

The school building is an old farmhouse, originally set on two acres of land, a portion of which was sold in 1977 to fund an upgrade. "It's as if you're in the country and yet there's the city around me," Spindel said.

A playground behind the school, complete with a bike path under a bridge, lends itself to parades for Yom Ha'atzmaut and Sukkot, she added.

The private, non-profit preschool, which is not affiliated with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz), serves 165 students from age 2 1/2 to 5, and also runs a summer day camp.

Shabbat and Jewish holidays are celebrated at the school, and a once-a-week Hebrew teacher supplements the children's Hebrew language education.

For further information about the birthday celebration, or to purchase tickets ($20 each, or free for children under age 2), call the school at 416-489-8355.

Haifa hospital planning major upgrade

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

During Israel's war with Hezbollah in the summer of 2006, Haifa's Rambam Health Care Campus was in the line of fire for the Islamic terror organizations' long-range missiles.

Some 60 rockets fell within a one-mile radius of the medical facility – which serves two million residents of Israel's north – and some splashed into the Mediterranean close to the hospital grounds. One missile "fell very close, adjacent to the hospital buildings and it shattered hospital windows," said Rafael Beyar, general director and CEO of the hospital.

Rafael Beyar

Beyar, who was in Toronto recently to meet with Canadian Friends of Rambam and other potential supporters, said no one was hurt in the barrage, but the hospital had to reorganize the way it treated patients. People were moved to the basement while sections of the facility were closed.

Though life has returned to normal, that wartime experience prompted a re-evaluation of the hospital's strategic plans to better take into account a nightmarish worst-case scenario.

Rambam has adopted a bold new concept that will see construction of an underground three-level parkade that can be quickly turned into an emergency hospital. Within 48 hours, the parking lot will be evacuated and converted into a 1,700-bed hospital, able to withstand missile bombardment, as well as chemical and biological attacks.

The bottom level is reserved for Rambam patients, the second floor for patients transferred from other hospitals, and the top level will serve as a fortified emergency ward. "I hope this will be a facility that nobody will need," Beyar said.

The redevelopment plan, code-named "The Vision of David," will see the fusion of medical services, biotechnology, research and education facilities in one large campus, most of it above ground. Total cost for the project stands today at $300 million (US), with the price of the underground hospital alone set at $100 million.

Rambam gets half of its capital funding from the government of Israel, but it relies on the private sector to make up the rest. With a seven-year timeline for completion of the project, the first building is expected to be completed in three years.

Until recently, Rambam was not as active as other institutions in soliciting financial help abroad but it is increasingly turning to these supporters –and within Israel – to help fund the hospital's expansion. Haifa native Sammy Ofer has put up $25 million towards the underground hospital project while an unnamed Canadian benefactor has put up a similar amount for a new oncology hospital, Beyar explained.

"We often come to the western countries to meet our friends," he added.

Canadians appreciate the importance of the hospital in serving Israel's northern population, regardless of religion. Jews, Muslims, Christians and Bah'ais all are treated there and can be found as members of the hospital's staff, he said.

Rambam was the campus where Technion faculty members Avram Hershko and Aaron Ciechanover conducted the chemistry research that earned each a Nobel Prize. Rambam staff co-operate with local high-tech firms to develop new drugs and devices. It is an incubator where staff come up with new ideas, develop them in conjunction with the private sector and test them at the hospital and other research facilities worldwide, Beyar said.

Canadian Friends of Rambam is a grass roots organization that assists the Rambam hospital provide medical services. For more information, email cframbam@gmail.com or call Suzanne Kaye at 416.560.0546.

Toronto man honoured for fostering Polish-Jewish ties

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Toronto man has been awarded a Polish medal for building bridges between Jews and Poles.

Peter Jassem, chair of the Toronto chapter of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada, received the Knight's Cross of the Order of Merit of the Republic of Poland in a ceremony at the Polish consulate last month.

The medal, which is given to Poles or foreigners who have rendered great service to Poland, was presented to Jassem by Marek Ciesielczuk, the Polish consul general in Toronto.

Jassem, a 56-year-old architect who immigrated to Canada 21 years ago from his native Poland, said he accepted the Knight's Cross in the spirit of advancing "dialogue and reconciliation," promoting better Polish-Jewish understanding and preserving "the unique and rich heritage of Polish Jewry."

In an interview, Jassem said that members of the foundation consist of persons of Jewish and Christian descent.

"This is a forum where can can jointly educate ourselves and each other, and discuss the complex issues of Polish-Jewish relations."

Peter Jassem

The foundation was established in 1988, shortly after Jassem arrived in Canada.

The founders of the Toronto branch were, among others, Rabbi Dow Marmur, Frank Bialystok, Louis Lenkinski, Henry Dasko and Sharon Weintraub.

Jassem joined the organization and became its chair about seven years ago.

He said it has helped him explore his Jewish roots.

Born near Poznan, and a resident of Szczecin prior to immigrating to Canada, Jassem is of mixed descent.

"My father's roots are Jewish and my mother's Christian," said Jassem, who discovered that his surname was shared by Polish Jews in the United States.

The discovery had a profound effect on him. "It was an emotional moment and a milestone in my own self-definition. All of a sudden, I had a feeling of reaching a resting point in my journey. I had a feeling of harmony and relaxation. I felt much richer. Now I could relate to a double heritage."

Jassem said his late father was of indispensable assistance in his genealogical search for his Jewish identity.

"My mother also provided enriching facts of how her Catholic parents harboured a Jewish girl during [the Holocaust], or how they embraced a Jewish son-in-law. She keeps sending me articles on Polish-Jewish issues."

The fraught relationship between Jews and Poles has improved against the backdrop of a Jewish revival in Poland and a surge of interest in Jews among Poles, he noted.

"More than 100 books on Jewish history and tradition are published annually in Poland. Hundreds of articles appear in the press. Cultural and research centres have been opened. Associations have been formed. Exhibitions, festivals and cultural events take place. Public debates and kitchen table conversations on many complex issues are commonplace."

And Poland's relations with Israel are exemplary, he added.

But outside Poland, Polish-Jewish relations are in need of improvement. "There are many stereotypes on both sides of the divide," said Jassem. "This is where our role begins as an educator and bridge builder. Progress is slow but noticeable."

Fond of speaking of Jews and Poles' "millennium-long common history," he said that the foundation has worked hard to promote its objectives.

Jassem, a member of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada, said that the foundation marked the 60th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, promoted the première of Roman Polanski's film, The Pianist, and presented an exhibition of prewar photographs of Polish Jews preserved by Polish Christians.

In addition, the foundation participates in Holocaust Education Week and book promotions.

"We've also created an annual award for the best student paper on the history of Polish Jewry and on Polish-Jewish relations.

"As well, we co-sponsored the first English translation of Yehiel Trunk's Poyln: My Life within Jewish Life in Poland, Sketches and Images, published by the University of Toronto Press."

Jassem, too, is the Canadian representative of the North American Council of the Museum of the History of Polish Jews, set to be built in Warsaw on the grounds of the former ghetto.

According to Jassem, the museum will be the most important institution of its kind, on a par with the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C ., and Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

"No visit to Poland will be complete without a visit to the museum. It will be a place to begin an exploration of the lost world of Polish Jews, and a place of dialogue and civic engagement."

Jassem said that Poland's current president, Lech Kaczynski, initiated the project when he was mayor of Warsaw.

Kaczynski also changed the status of Polish Righteous Gentiles who saved Jews during the Holocaust, recognizing them as the equals of Polish soldiers and insurgents who battled the Nazis.

Apart from his role at the foundation, Jassem is on the executive of Jewish Records Indexing-Poland, an international organization that has created a database on Polish Jews and is dedicated to improving state-of-the-art Jewish genealogical research.

Players pitch for Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Daniel Warner is pitching for Israel – again.

He is preparing for the second annual Pitch for Israel softball tournament, Aug. 23 at the Powerade Centre in Brampton, which raises money to allow children from families living below the poverty line to attend summer camp.

Warner, 26, a managing partner at Campus Marketing Agency and a student at York University's Schulich School of Business, was recently honoured by Jewish Family & Child's Homework Club for initiating last year's tournament in partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The tournament raised $30,000, half of which went toward sending local children to camp through a partnered program between JF&C and UJA Federation, and half to support federation's partnership with the Israeli city of Eilat, where it supports programs for the city's children.

A graduate of Hebrew day schools and the University of Western Ontario, Warner started the tournament because he was "keen" to raise money for kids who didn't have the opportunity to go to camp.

As a baseball player, he said, he thought it would be a great idea to run a tournament.

"The Toronto Blue Jays, JUMP [Jewish Urban Meeting Place], Birthright NEXT and CIE [Canada Israel Experience] were our presenting partners in the inaugural Pitch for Israel, and I look forward to working with them again this year."

He said he is targeting young adults aged 21 to 34 to form teams – players of any skill level are welcome – for this year's tournament, and teams will be split into male and female. Each team is guaranteed three games.

Nearly all of last year's teams are returning, he said, but new players can join either individually or as a team. Tournament sponsors include Fabricland, Spinmaster, Mac Cosmetics and Dynamic Funds.

For information on playing in the tournament, volunteering or joining a committee, call Warner at 416-540-7373, or e-mail daniel@campusmarketingagency.com.

McGill Ghetto Shul raises funds in Toronto

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Glick, 23, a McGill graduate, says the Ghetto Shul provides a social network for out-of-town students like herself.

"It was the social hub of the ghetto. People would come out for these incredible Shabbat dinners. We'd get between 60 to 100 people a week."

Rabbi Daniel Leibish Hundert

She is among the alumnae and students who will be talking about the Ghetto Shul's importance for out-of-town students at an upcoming fundraiser in Toronto.

Spiritual leader Rabbi Daniel Leibish Hundert and his wife, Dena, will be attending this parlour meeting, which takes place in a private home in the Bathurst-Eglinton area on May 24 at 7:30 p.m.

Glick is also an organizer of an alumnae reunion on Shavuot, which will be held at the shul's new digs at 3458 Park Ave. in Montreal, May 28 to 30.

She attributes the shul's popularity to Rabbi Hundert's charismatic leadership.

Her words are echoed by Rachel Rosenbluth, 19, a first year environmental studies student.

"I was just looking for a way to find meaning in Montreal after spending a year in Israel."

She describes Rabbi Hundert and his wife as "inspiring in the way they find meaning in every aspect of life."

Rosenbluth was a regular participant at the weekly Shabbat dinners and the Tuesday jam nights.

Rabbi Hundert is a native Montrealer with an eclectic background that includes Jewish day school, an alternative international college and five years at yeshivas in Israel.

While his family strongly identified with their Jewish roots – his Toronto-born father, Gershon, is a Jewish studies professor at McGill – Rabbi Hundert says he became shomer Shabbat on his own at the age of 17.

He has also been playing saxophone since his bar mitzvah, and music continues to play a large role in his life and it's an important liturgical component of the Ghetto Shul.

He says the shul, which is now in its eighth year, was started by Rabbi Avi Poupko in 2001 as way of offering a Shabbat venue for McGill students living downtown.

Its initial home was an upper duplex in the student ghetto.

"The meals were very communal."

By the third year, the shul had to rent a hotel ballroom for High Holiday services to accommodate the 300 to 400 worshippers who attended.

Rabbi Hundert, 32, became the spiritual leader – he had just returned from Israel and was starting undergraduate studies – when Rabbi Poupko left to go to Israel.

The synagogue managed to survive financially through student and parent donations, membership fees, and – mostly – from the substantial funding allocated by Hillel and Federation CJA in Montreal.

"We have been getting 75 to 120 students a week, for Shabbat," the rabbi says, adding that students like the shul because "it doesn't feel like a traditional space."

The shul was supported by Hillel, which doesn't offer consistent Shabbat programming.

When there were some problems with the shul's premises because of fire code regulations, services moved to Hillel House for the 2007-08 academic year.

"It was not clear if it would survive."

However, Hillel board members have been helping the shul work toward getting charitable status as an independent entity because Hillel and federation are no longer able to provide the same financial support that the shul was able to rely on for the past seven years, due to budget cuts made across the board, explains the rabbi.

Some Hillel board members have joined the Ghetto Shul board and helped to secure a new venue, a two-level storefront on Park Avenue, he says.

"We've raised the money for a year's rent. It was a tremendous show of confidence from families of current students, alumnae and other supporters."

He says they have now initiated a major fundraising drive in Toronto, where the largest number of student members reside.

He stresses that the shul attracts students of all denominations.

To find out about the Shavuot alumnae reunion in Montreal or the Toronto parlour meeting on May 24, contact Hava Glick at 416-554-1972.

To donate, visit www.supportghettoshul.com, or call Hillel at 514-845-9171.

MK replaces COR as hechsher on airline meals

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish Community Council/Vaad Ha'ir in Montreal is now the sole certifier of kosher food on Air Canada and many other airline flights originating in Canada, replacing COR of Toronto, after Canada's largest airline switched its kosher catering contract to a new joint Israeli-Canadian venture under the MK hechsher.

The agreement between the Vaad, Air Canada and kosher meal providers that came into effect May 1 is historic, Vaad officials said, because it puts into place the "highest" standard of kashrut under an MK Mehadrin hechsher that they say is acceptable even to haredim.

The new deal represents a coup for the Vaad, which now oversees the kashrut for all airline meals – including Air Canada's and specific El Al meals – prepared at Cara Airline Solutions' kosher kitchen in Toronto. Some 29 airlines – including KLM, Air France and British Airways – will now have their kosher meals supplied by Cara with an MK (Montreal Kosher) hechsher, instead of a COR certification.

But it also signified a loss for Montreal kosher caterers and restaurants, which had prepared kosher food for flights out of Montreal under the MK hechsher, as well as for the Toronto-based Kashruth Council of Canada, whose COR hechsher had been on all kosher meals made in the Ontario capital. The Air Canada meals had been supplied by another company, LSG Sky Chefs, in partnership with Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers of Toronto.

Now all kosher airline meals prepared at the Toronto Cara facility will bear the MK Mehadrin stamp, while the COR stamp will appear only on airline meals prepared by LSG Sky Chefs, said Rabbi Saul Emanuel, the Vaad's executive director.

Rabbi Emanuel said the new "partnership" between the Vaad, Cara, and Hamasbia Airline Food Industries in Israel – which supplies "special kosher" meals for haredi passengers on flights from Israel – will bring an unprecedented level of quality, consistency and service to the kosher traveller.

"This is a very, very big deal," he said.

HamasbiaCanada, a new company formed out of the Cara and Hamasbia Israel partnership, is the entity that will run the kosher airline meal operation.

Rabbi Emanuel said kosher meals on Air Canada and other airlines' flights from Canada are to be produced out of the huge Cara kosher kitchen facility on the outskirts of Toronto's Pearson International Airport. The kitchen was revamped over the last few weeks to meet MK Mehadrin-level standards and is manned by Cara employees, who prepare the meals.

A HamasbiaCanada sign has already replaced a "Cara Airline Solutions" sign on the exterior of the kosher kitchen, and the facility's kashrut is being overseen solely by Montreal Vaad mashgichim.

The new arrangement came about as a result of concerns expressed by Air Canada over the inconsistent quality of kosher meals served to passengers on its flights from Canada, Rabbi Emanuel said.

According to Rabbi Emanuel, when Air Canada saw the higher quality of Hamasbia Israel "special kosher" meals – meaning meals acceptable to haredi Jews – on its flights from Israel (the company also supplies "special" meals on El Al flights from Israel), the airline began consulting with Hamasbia Israel's president, Azriel Tauber, on ways to improve kosher meals coming from Canada.

Within a few months, Rabbi Emanuel said, Air Canada notified its kosher supplier in Toronto that it would be switching from LSG Sky Chefs to Cara's kosher kitchen, which also prepares meals for El Al flights from Canada.

He said Cara at the same time was in the process of consulting with Hamasbia Israel's Tauber, a longtime acquaintance of Rabbi Yonasan Weiss, chief rabbi of the Montreal Vaad's Beth Din, and Tauber recommended to Cara that the Vaad's MK Mehadrin certification be used for meals prepared at the Cara kitchen.

"On that basis [HamasbiaCanada] was started," Rabbi Emanuel said. "By Air Canada switching to Cara, that's what allowed this project to happen."

Calls to Air Canada and COR officials weren't returned by the CJN's deadline, but in an April 30 posting on its website, the Kashruth Council said it "wishes to advise the community that Cara Airline Solutions, a provider of kosher airline meals, is no longer under COR supervision."

Isaac Drookman, owner of Zuchter Berk, called the new deal "a disaster" because "it makes both kashrut agencies [MK and COR] weaker," since there's now a "second option" and each might seek to encroach on the other's turf.

"COR and the MK are at war," he said.

Under the agreement, all kosher meals prepared by HamsbiaCanada at Cara will be sealed and shrink-wrapped and bear the HamasbiaCanada and MK Mehadrin labels and insignias. A green label will indicate a pareve meal. Red will signify meat; blue, dairy; and mustard colour, fish.

Meals for El Al flights out of Canada will also be prepared at the newly configured kitchen, but only the airline's "special kosher" meals will be sealed. Non-"special" kosher meals will continue to be certified by El Al's own chief rabbi.

Rabbi Emanuel said the deal was finalized in mid-April, leaving less than two weeks to meet the May 1 start deadline.

The process, he said, included many trips to Toronto by Vaad officials, consultations with suppliers, marketers, and food production experts, adjusting meal ingredients to the MK Mehadrin-level "gold standard," and Cara using its own team of engineers and designers to accommodate and put into place "technical changes" needed to revamp the kitchen.

In an interview from Israel, Tauber said he was "extremely happy to have a partner who is trustworthy and who is making every effort to make this story a success."

"With both parties open-minded and committed to doing the right thing, it made things easier," he said.

Rabbi Emanuel thinks the new kosher kitchen will be the largest in North America, estimating that it will prepare more than 100,000 meals annually.

He declined to disclose how much the Vaad will earn from the new arrangement, but he was adamant that it's not about the money.

There are also plans to have high-quality mehadrin-level kosher food available at airports as well as in the frozen food sections of grocery stores.

Ignatieff reflects on shared goodwill

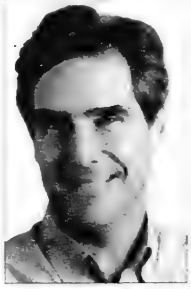
In another statement, Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff reflected on the goodwill shared by both countries, calling it "a relationship between proud allies, built on our mutual respect, our common commitment to democracy and our shared hopes for a peaceful future."

He added: "On May 11, 1949, Canada recognized Israel's independence. I am proud that it was a Liberal government that did so."



Michael Ignatieff

Meanwhile, Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman took time to emphasize the importance of the relationship, terming it a "special friendship."

"Not only was Canada one of the 33 countries who voted for the establishment of the state in the UN on Nov. 29, 1947... the Canadian representative also played a central role in the passing of the resolution," Lieberman said, and he singled out the important role of the Jewish community in Canada "in the preservation and strengthening" of the relationship.

"The diverse relationship between the two countries is currently expressed by [a] free-trade agreement, [a] joint industrial [research and development] fund, and bilateral co-operation in many fields, including agricultural research, water treatment, internal security, legal co-operation, relationships between universities and cultural exchanges," he added.

Also marking the occasion was the Canada-Israel Committee.

Its chair, Moshe Ronen, thanked parliamentarians for their continuing support of Israel.

"On behalf of Canada's pro-Israel community, I would like to offer my sincere gratitude to all members of Parliament for their unanimous support of this resolution. We are particularly thrilled that Israel's Knesset adopted a similar resolution today," he said.

"The multi-partisan support given to today's resolution in [the] House of Commons speaks to the demonstrable growth in the Canada-Israel relationship over the past several years. As we look to the future, I am confident that Canada's relationship with Israel will continue to flourish."

Commemorative events for the anniversary are scheduled to continue throughout the rest of 2009 via "a number of diplomatic, cultural and academic events in Canada and Israel," according to the ministries of foreign affairs for both nations.

Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general for Toronto and western Canada, told The CJN that all events planned by the Israeli and Canadian embassies for this year will be done "under the headline of 60 years of diplomatic relations," and he alluded to major upcoming Israel-themed events at Toronto's Luminato Festival and later this year at the Toronto International Film Festival. He added that Montreal's Les Grands Ballets Canadiens is also scheduled to perform in Tel Aviv later this year to mark the Israeli city's 100th anniversary.

Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto: M

A Foundation for the future

By Barbra Green

Ten years ago, Vision magazine profiled three philanthropic trailblazers in a story about a bold and unprecedented gift to the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

Driven by shared values, priorities and a mutual desire to help build a thriving Jewish community, Morris Perlis, Allan Silber and Ed Sonshine (Counsel Corporation's then President, Chairman & CEO and Vice-Chairman, respectively) made a record donation of $10 million in personal stock to establish the first donor advised funds.

The gift, which took advantage of the Federal government's then drastic cuts to capital gains taxes for donated securities, brought the Foundation's assets to $71 million and opened the floodgates for similar donations.

Chaired at the time by David Goldstein, the Foundation's assets grew from $71 million to over $200 million today. Now chaired by Honey Sherman, the Foundation encompasses over 490 individual funds and has over $160 million in planned gifts (designated as bequests in wills or donated life insurance policies). In addition, every year the Jewish Foundation distributes millions of dollars to support organizations and programs across Canada, Israel and around the world.

The growth has been both dramatic and profound. And just as the Jewish Foundation has flourished, so too have the three families that raised the charitable bar in Toronto a decade ago. Ten children, ten daughters and sons-in-law and 15 grandchildren later, the spirit and tradition of giving continues.

Indeed, the Perlis, Silber and Sonshine children, together with their spouses, are embracing philanthropy and their community – seeking out projects and roles that resonate and inspire.

When Alan, Herschel and Nathan Perlis decided to collaborate on a fund with the Jewish Foundation, camp was the obvious focus.

"For me and my brothers, and our wives, camp was probably the most integral part of what created our background, our Jewish being," said Alan. "We wanted to help people who couldn't have the same experience that we had, because for us, this was the most important experience growing up."

Every year, the three couples will contribute to the newly-created Perlis Family Camp and Community Fund, with two-thirds dedicated to camp scholarships and the remainder to building the fund's capital.

For the next generation of Sonshines, a strategic restructuring of their parents' fund has placed increased responsibility for grant-making in their capable hands. For Daniel Sonshine, the current co-chair of UJA Federation's Jewish Chamber of Commerce, this new challenge has allowed his family to dream bigger, broadening their scope to include United Jewish Appeal, Mount Sinai Hospital, Zareinu, and a new program they're spearheading at the Speech and Stuttering Institute.

While individual interests and circumstances undoubtedly impact their charitable choices, their parents' actions remain the common denominator.

"Philanthropy and charitable work have always been a huge part of our parents' lives," said Daniel. "I remember being a bit amazed when they made that Foundation gift ten years ago. It showed me just how important giving really was to them. As a result of their lifelong approach to charitable work, community involvement and philanthropy have always been things that I value."

"For my parents, when it came to tzedakah, it wasn't a matter of if, but a matter of where," said Josh Silber. "In our own unique ways, I hope my siblings and I will be as effective as my parents were in stressing the importance of giving."

Alan Perlis echoed the sentiment when it comes to his growing brood.

"I hope that they'll continue the giving, continue the tradition that was started by my parents and passed on to my brothers and our wives," he said, "that we'll raise them as well as our parents raised us to understand the importance of giving and philanthropy and helping others."

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto and you: a partnership that benefits us all.

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto is dedicated to creating permanent resources to meet the challenges and needs of the Jewish community.

As the endowment development program of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Jewish Foundation works in partnership with individuals, families and private foundations to enhance Jewish and community life. Together we are transforming and enriching lives with programs and services that make a difference in Toronto, Canada, Israel and around the world. Donors accomplish these goals through lifetime gifts, deferred giving programs and bequests.

Meeting community needs and challenges

Bat mitzvah leads to making a difference

By Alan T. Domb

In today's challenging times, it's heart-warming to hear about a Toronto teen intent on making a tangible difference in the lives of others.

Lainie Yallen enrolled in the Jewish Foundation's B'nai Tzedek Youth Philanthropy program after being inspired by her older brother's bar mitzvah initiative to dedicate a playground in Kiryat Shmona, Israel.

"I was thrilled to be a part of the excitement and attend the dedication with all our family," says Lainie. "When it came time for my bat mitzvah, I knew that I wanted to make a difference too."

And that's exactly what Lainie has done, choosing to direct her bat mitzvah gifts to the creation of an extreme sports centre in Sderot, Israel.

"The children of Sderot need a safe place to spend their leisure time; a place that will help ease the tensions in their lives, and where they could play and just be kids," she says. "They cannot play outside or at outdoor playgrounds because being outside presents too serious a security risk. This will be a place where kids can just be kids and try to forget about their worries of the constant attacks."

Lainie's fund at the Jewish Foundation has almost reached her fundraising goal and now that she is a Bat Mitzvah, has already established her first legacy.

"I am happy that I have begun to do my part toward tikun olam and that my project, which I hope will bring much happiness to the lives of children who live in much worse conditions than I do, is a real act of chesed and tzedakah. I hope that it is the first of many that I will be able to do as I become an adult."

Young woman's dream comes true

By Daniel Horowitz

As Esther Berman's plane began its descent into Israel's Ben-Gurion Airport, she, as well as her fellow passengers, shared the unmistakable surge of excitement, anticipation and Jewish pride unique to that special moment.

But, while the others on her plane simply rolled up their window shades to take in the view, Esther, who is clinically blind, didn't have to scan the scenery to know she was finally in Israel.

Esther's first trip to the Jewish state was aboard a Canada Israel Experience Taglit Birthright Israel journey. Made possible by a donor at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, Esther was accompanied by a "shadow," David Lifshitz.

"My experience on that trip was priceless," said Esther. "It has given me unforgettable memories and created a feeling of closeness to Israel that I didn't even know before."

Esther's experience was made possible by Torontonian Harry Shilling, who created an endowment fund at the Jewish Foundation.

"The Harry Shilling Israel Fund was created to send disadvantaged young people to Israel, and I am thrilled that Esther Berman was able to do just that," enthused Shilling. "To know that she went and experienced Israel for the first time makes me feel better than if I had gone myself. To help a young person achieve something that otherwise wouldn't be possible makes me so very happy, and so proud."

"Being in Israel gave me such a peaceful, fulfilling sensation, and it was just so great to be able to be Jewish there," said Esther, 23. "For once, I didn't have to fight for my Jewish rights; I didn't have to fight my university to defer an exam so that I didn't have to write it on a Saturday; I didn't have to ask my employer to give me extra days off so I could observe Jewish holidays. In Israel, all those troubles were so far away. I could freely observe Shabbat and just be as Jewish as I wanted."

Esther's Birthright Israel experience also took place during a very special time for Jews worldwide, making her trip that much more memorable.

"Being in Israel during Chanukah was a very special experience for me," she explained. "It was so amazing to be in a place where almost every household had a menorah in its window. That was not something I was used to, that's for sure."

Esther's maiden voyage to Israel had everything she had hoped for, but, even in her wildest imagination, she didn't realize just how much she would experience on her journey, with the assistance of David.

"Going to the Kotel was a memorable, life-changing and emotional experience," she said. "It is unbelievable how this one particular spot can take over one's thoughts and feelings just by being there."

Some of the other highlights of Esther's trip included riding a camel, shopping in Jerusalem and hiking.

"It was an unforgettable experience, one that I will always cherish, and if it wasn't for the efforts of CIE and the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, I wouldn't have been able to go on a Birthright Israel trip by myself," said an emotional Esther. "It is because of them and Mr. Shilling that I finally got to experience Israel."

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Just a Second Shop (JASS), operated by Jewish Family & Child, is set to celebrate its 25th anniversary on May 31.

Located at 4117 Bathurst St., south of Sheppard Avenue, the store, open six days a week, offers new and gently used clothing and small household items at reasonable prices.

Ron Prosserman, volunteer chair for the anniversary celebrations, said that the store is "one of the more exciting ventures at JF&CS. It helps our most vulnerable women, children and Jewish families with their clothing needs, and enhances their lives and dignity."

He said that JASS serves 50 to 60 clients of JF&CS and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services weekly – clients on financial assistance can select a certain number of items at no charge – and has at least 800 members "on the books."

Last year, he said, proceeds from the store helped send a number of youths to Jewish day and overnight camps.

Donations of nearly new clothing and small household items such as dishes, cutlery and small appliances, books and toys in good working condition are always welcome, said Prosserman, and can be deposited at the yellow collection boxes located in front of the store, at Associated Hebrew School on Atkinson Avenue, at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on Bayview Avenue.

Donations are also received through clothing drives by individuals or Hebrew day schools and from canvassing of manufacturers or retail outlets for new merchandise, he said.

He said that he asks people to be "thoughtful" when donating items. "They should be gently used and the clothing should be preferably in season. We have to pay to discard anything we can't use."

Rachel Landy, a volunteer co-ordinator at JASS, said that they concentrate on customer service. "Our staff and volunteers speak a number of languages, so everyone feels welcome when they walk in the door, whether or not they are paying customers.

Prosserman said they're all looking forward to the anniversary celebrations. "We're having door-crasher specials, music, and some extra special fashions. We're putting in extra effort to make it an exciting day."

Junior fundraiser is at it again

Compiled by CJN Staff

Amanda Belzowski is only 11 years old, but she's already an experienced fundraiser who knows how to get people to give to a worthwhile cause.

And one fundraising event that's dear to her heart is the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario's annual Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart.

This year, Amanda will hold her 11th annual lemonade stand on Sunday, May 31. Amanda's stand has raised more than $100,000 for the cause to date. She'll be joined by her brother, Joshua, 3, who will be fundraising too, with his own stand – the first annual cookie counter. Their goal this year is to double their fundraising total to $200,000.

You can find Amanda and Joshua from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. at 10 Brian Cliff Dr., off Lawrence Avenue East, west of Leslie Street, across from Edwards Gardens.

The money they raise will help fund life-saving heart and stroke research for children and adults.

Amanda has her own website dedicated to fundraising for the Ride for Heart, www.lemonade4heart.org, where you can find out how to sponsor her.

Amanda's silent auctions at her lemonade stand always have something special to offer. This year, for the second time, famed magician David Copperfield has donated tickets to his show in Las Vegas. The highest bidders will get to meet him and tour his warehouse. The prize includes airfare and a suite at the MGM Grand Hotel.

Also up for auction will be a basketball signed by the Toronto Raptors and a hockey stick signed by the Toronto Maple Leafs.

The Toronto Argonauts are providing a luxury suite at a 2009 regular season game, along with a pre-game field tour at a regular season game and an autographed jersey from CEO Michael "Pinball" Clemons.

Two-time Olympic gold medal gymnast Lance Ringnald has contributed a number of Olympics-related items, and pointe shoes signed by a prima ballerina from the National Ballet of Canada will also be auctioned off.

Popular children's performer Dan the Music Man will put on a show at noon. Life-size children's cartoon character Dora the Explorer, donated by Daytime Enterprises, will be there to greet kids, and Bulldog Fitness will bring dance pads for aerobic workouts for kids. Lionel's Pony Farm will also offer pony rides from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m.

Amanda and her family will also join more than 13,000 other cyclists June 7 in this year's Becel Heart & Stroke Ride for Heart. Call416-486-RIDE (7433) or visit www.rideforheart.ca for details.

Lawyer advocated for Gaucher patients

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Mark Freedman, a highly respected condominium lawyer and leading advocate for patients with Gaucher disease (GD), a rare genetic disorder occurring most commonly in Ashkenazi Jews, died May 9 of lymphoma at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital. He was 55.

Despite his own battle with GD, which began when he was studying law at the University of Western Ontario, Freedman never complained, his wife, Judy Jacobs, said in a eulogy.

Mark Freedman

Friend Stephen Karr – a partner at Harris, Sheaffer, which Freedman co-founded in 1992 – recalled Freedman's attendance at meetings "on days when he could barely muster the strength to come into the office, and his clients were never aware of what was transpiring."

GD, caused by an enzyme deficiency, affects the blood system and bones. Excruciating bone pain, which Freedman suffered in the early years, is a common complication.

Karr's eulogy began with words he wrote to honour Freedman this month at an Ontario Bar Association dinner, where Freedman was to receive an award for excellence in real estate. Freedman, who co-wrote what Karr called "the seminal textbook on the Condominium Act in Ontario," taught in the Ontario Bar admission course from 1994 to 2005, wrote articles and lectured frequently, and appeared on local television. The Canadian Condominium Institute named him Man of the Year in 1987.

He served for the past three years as co-chair of State of Israel Bonds, Toronto's builders' division, and from 1988 to 1991 as chair of the board of governors at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue. In 1991, he founded the National Gaucher Foundation of Canada and was president until 2007.

Freedman lobbied successfully for the funding of an effective but prohibitively expensive drug for Gaucher Disease, first in Ontario, then across Canada, spending six years meeting with government officials.

He and Jacobs first learned of the drug known as Ceredase (now used in a form called Cerezyme) in 1991, she said.

Dr. Joe Clarke, speaking at the funeral on behalf of Freedman's medical team, said the first Ontario patient to receive Ceredase – a two-year-old who likely would have died in two or three years without it – is now 17 and doing well.

He said Freedman "was at the forefront of research directed at developing alternative treatments." In Israel last year, Freedman met with researchers working on a simpler form of Ceredase, which Clarke said "looks like it may be at least as effective as the original drug, and much cheaper."

Grateful patients and their families, some of whom had travelled hundreds of kilometres, were among the estimated 900 mourners at the funeral.

Jacobs – who met her husband as an undergraduate at McGill University, where Freedman studied microbiology and immunology – recalled his ability to connect with people from all walks of life.

A native of Portsmouth, N.H., Freedman "never lost that small-town openness, compassion and respect for others," she said. "And he was so able to laugh at himself."

Karr said everyone used to gently kid Freedman about the couple's frequent trips. "But," he added, "Mark understood his condition well, and he understood the fragility of life, and was not going to put off his passion for travel until some later time."

Freedman is survived by Judy Jacobs, his wife of 32 years; his parents Robert and Selma Freedman of Portsmouth, N.H.; his brothers Alan of Andover, Mass.; and Bert, of Portsmouth.

Book on wills tells the story of life

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

At the end of their 212-page book on wills and inheritance, authors Les Kotzer and Barry Fish tell a story that pretty much sums up the lessons to be learned from practising this particular branch of the law.

It arises out of a seminar they hosted on wills and estates, in which a questioner bares her soul discussing the disagreement she had with her brother over a business their father had left them. Can you separate a business relationship from a personal one involving a brother, they are asked, prompting a volley of responses from the seminar participants that goes on for hours.

As they sum up the evening, the lawyers say: "We came here so that we could help you learn something about the law; but as it turned out, you helped us learn something about life."

In 80 vignettes, distilled from a combined 50 years in the practice of law, Kotzer and Fish have put together a fascinating and eminently readable compilation of incidents that describe the human condition.

Titled, Where There's an Inheritance, the book is less an exposition on the law applicable to wills, and more about the people whose lives turn for the better – often for the worst – over the way in which a loved one's estate is distributed. Kotzer and Fish also co-wrote The Family Fight...Planning to Avoid It and The Family War...Winning the Inheritance Battle.

It is shocking to see how even the best of families can be torn apart over an inheritance, how once close brothers and sisters will never speak again after the death of a parent. Money, apparently, changes everything, often not for the better, but the book also presents heartwarming stories of siblings rediscovering the closeness of their relationship after their parent's death.

The stories are "reality," explained Kotzer, who has appeared on Canadian and American television and radio shows to discuss wills. "This is not a book of fables."

Indeed. There's the story of the mother who loaned large sums to both her son and daughter. After her husband died she found herself in dire financial straits. When she asked her children to help her by paying back some of the money, they became angry, turned her down and her son even told her to "prove it" – demonstrate that the money he'd received was a loan and not a gift.

Then there's the one about grandfather's prized gold watch, which was purchased in the 1950s after the family pooled together $3,000 (a huge sum back then). The grandchildren's great-aunt had been given the money and asked to purchase the watch. When the grandchildren went to get it appraised decades later, it turned out it was worth only $389 – their great-aunt had pocketed the difference!

Then there was the case of the uncle who became guardian and executor for his nephew and niece. The will instructed him to transfer a substantial inheritance to them when they turned 18. Despite his advice to them to permit him to continue to manage their estate, they demanded the money. It didn't take long for both children to burn through their entire inheritance.

Of course, not all the stories are so disheartening. Cynthia was a mother who at the end of her life was saddened that her children had grown apart. As part of the will-reading, she prepared a photo album showing the way the two had grown up – extremely close and loving siblings. A posthumous letter reminded them how they had looked out for each other as they grew up. Cynthia's wisdom and love brought the siblings together and the two were no longer cold and distant, Kotzer and Fish write.

Wills have to be tailored to the specific needs of clients, Kotzer explained. And they have to be able to stand up over time. "You have to look down a long road," added Fish.

"The book takes you deep into what can happen, the good, the bad and the ugly," said Kotzer. "After you read it you will realize the depth of what you need to know."

One incident, told in the book, affected Kotzer's own views on life. After an appearance on Citytv's Breakfast Television, he received a request to meet with a terminally ill patient to compose her will. The woman came to his office on a cold, windy, rainy, miserable day. When he went down into the parking lot to meet her, she had her hand out the door and commented, "what a beautiful day." Kotzer learned that "Rachel" had died only a few weeks after their meeting. "That woman changed my outlook on life," he said. "You learn to appreciate what you've got."

And though a good portion of the stories show how families can come to blows over property, it also demonstrates that "it's not worth fighting over. Families will see themselves in some of these stories. There may be solutions [to their problems] and people won't feel alone. They're not alone."

Air Canada pilot co-founds organization to mentor would-be Jewish flyers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

To say that Matthew Ritter is a frequent flyer would be an understatement.

On any given day, Ritter may be in Montreal, Ottawa, Halifax, Calgary, Vancouver, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Seattle or Miami.

Or maybe even a Caribbean destination such as Barbados.

Ritter, 31, is an Air Canada pilot, a captain who, on average, flies 15 to 16 days per month.

Flying a narrow body, twin-engine, medium-range Brazilian-made Embraer 175 or 190 plane – which can accommodate 93 and 73 passengers respectively – Ritter typically makes one to four trips a day when on duty.

Such is his schedule that he may fly from Toronto to Ottawa on one day, and from Seattle to St. John's, Newfoundland, via Toronto, on a more hectic day.

"I love it," he said during a recent break. "I feel very fortunate to have the opportunity to fly such amazing machinery. I know I'm very privileged. I worked hard to get to this point. I don't take it for granted."

Air Canada pilot Matthew Ritter

Ritter joined Air Canada about four years ago and flew for a regional carrier in the United States, Chautauqua Airlines, prior to that.

Based in Toronto, he is a member of the fairly exclusive club of Jewish pilots employed by Air Canada, Canada's flagship airline.

Although he personally knows 10 Air Canada pilots who are Jewish, he has heard that 20 to 30 are on its employment roster.

In percentage terms, this means that less than one per cent of Air Canada's pilots are of the Jewish faith.

Ritter – whose father was once executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee and now heads the Newfoundland and Labrador Medical Association – decided to enter the aviation industry when he was 23.

After graduating from the University of Ottawa with a major in psychology, he met a seasoned Air Canada pilot who encouraged him to consider a career as a pilot and became his mentor.

Before meeting him by chance, Ritter considered flying nothing more than a hobby and had already applied for medical school, fairly certain that he would be a doctor.

I don't think I would have become a commercial airline pilot if not for him," said Ritter, whose appetite for flying was whetted when he accompanied his father on Air Canada's inaugural flight from Canada to Israel in the mid-1990s. "It was just one of those fluke events."

"It was an intense program with a lot of tests," he recalled. "A very regulated, fast-paced environment, not necessarily for everyone."

Asked what it takes to be a pilot, he listed several qualities: dedication, conscientiousness, a passion for aviation, a sense of responsibility and leadership and decision-making and inter-personal skills.

Hired by Chautauqua Airlines in Orlando, Fla., Ritter flew to such short-haul destinations in the southeastern United States as Fort Lauderdale, Fla., and Charleston, S.C.

A dual Canadian-U.S. citizen by virtue of his Boston-born mother, Shari, Ritter joined Air Canada in the summer of 2005.

Aside from being a pilot, he has also been a simulated flight instructor for Air Canada. "You learn a lot about the aircraft and meet many people."

When he is working, he arrives at the airport 75 minutes prior to takeoff. He meets fellow pilots, prints out a flight plan, speaks to a dispatcher, checks weather reports and discusses operational and administrative issues.

From the moment he takes his seat in the cockpit, Ritter is vigilant. "Safety is paramount," he said. "I don't take my job lightly."

He remains on the aircraft, waiting to fly to another city. He deplanes and rests before taking the helm of a new aircraft. He stops at a hotel for a layover.

"Flight hours are strictly regulated," he said.

At the moment, he has no plans to apply for time-consuming international routes because his family comes first.

He and his wife, Jennifer – the chief executive officer of Make-A-Wish Canada and the former director of UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto – have two toddlers, both boys.

Ritter, whose younger brother Jonathan works for a large brewery in a management position, is the co-founder of a new organization, Jews in Aviation, which he describes as "a Jewish aviation clearing house."

Connecting Jews in the industry, and co-founded by Howard Cooper, an American general aviation pilot, its members are found in Canada, United States, Israel, Mexico and Britain.

"We're trying to create a network of aviation professionals who can serve as mentors and advisers. It will be a resource for Jews who want to pursue a career in aviation, which is a little foreign to the Jewish community in the Diaspora, but not, of course, in Israel."

The web address of Jews in Aviation is www.Jewsinaviation.org.

Ritter, who said that less that one per cent of Air Canada pilots are Jewish, is the co-founder of an organization called Jews in Aviation, a network of pilots that can be a resource for Jews who want to pursue a career in aviation.

U.S. will know before any Iran strike: Israel

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has acceded to American demands by pledging to co-ordinate its moves on Iran with Washington and not surprise the United States with military action.

During a trip to Jerusalem earlier this week, CIA chief Leon Panetta informed Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that U.S. President Barack Obama demanded that Israel not launch a surprise attack on Iran. The message expressed concern that Israel would cause an escalation in the region and undermine Obama's efforts to improve relations with Tehran.

However, the content was nothing new: the Bush administration also sent tough messages to Jerusalem a year ago, including a demand that it not strike Iran. Israeli officials believe that U.S. foreign policy professionals are vehemently opposed to an Israeli strike on Iran's nuclear facilities, so this position was transmitted from the previous administration to the present one.

The U.S. expects Israel to co-ordinate its military actions with Washington, a condition to which Jerusalem has agreed due to its dependence on U.S. aid. Senior officials in the Bush administration testified to Congress that Israel had consulted them before deciding on its 2007 air strike on an alleged Syrian nuclear reactor. They said Israel had explained that it considered the Syrian project an existential threat and therefore had to act.

In his first trip to Israel as CIA chief, about three weeks ago, Panetta met with Netanyahu, Defence Minister Ehud Barak, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman and Mossad chief Meir Dagan. Panetta was White House chief of staff under Bill Clinton from 1994 to 1997. In this capacity, he and his president weathered a stormy phase of the peace process, the assassination of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres' brief term as prime minister and the advent of the first Netanyahu government. During those years, Clinton visited Israel three times, so Panetta got to know the Israeli leadership.

In the Senate confirmation hearing for his appointment as CIA chief, Panetta said he has no doubt Iran is working toward nuclear weapons capability.

The Iranian threat will play a central role in Netanyahu's talks with Obama, Congress and senior U.S. officials during his visit to Washington next week. After the prime minister returns, Lieberman goes to Washington for his first visit. He will head the strategic dialogue between the U.S. and Israel, which will focus on Iran.

Obama declares Jewish American Heritage Month

JTA

WASHINGTON — President Barack Obama declared May to be Jewish American Heritage Month.

In a proclamation signed last week, Obama writes that the Jewish American tradition "exemplifies the strength of the American immigrant tradition" and that "the focus on preserving traditions is a notable characteristic of Jewish culture."

"Jewish Americans have immeasurably enriched our nation," the proclamation states. "Unyielding in the face of hardship and tenacious in following their dreams, Jewish Americans have surmounted the challenges that every immigrant group faces and have made unparallelled contributions."

Politics abounds on Pope's mission of peace to Israel

By MARCY OSTER

JERUSALEM — Coming as a self-described "pilgrim of peace," Pope Benedict XVI vowed to fight anti-Semitism and called for a Palestinian state in the moments after his arrival in Israel for his recent five-day visit.

But controversy marked the visit from the start, as the Pope's supposedly non-political trip abounded with politics and his hosts in Israel and the Palestinian Authority parsed his words with nearly talmudic precision, eyeing support for their positions.

On his first day in Israel, May 11, the Pope was criticized for not being contrite enough about the Holocaust on behalf of the Catholic Church. Later he cut short an interfaith meeting of clergy after a Palestinian Muslim cleric launched a surprise attack on Israel during an impromptu address.

"I come, like so many others before me, to pray at the holy places, to pray especially for peace – peace here in the Holy Land, and peace throughout the world," Benedict said during a welcoming ceremony at Ben-Gurion International Airport, where he was met by President Shimon Peres and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Benedict would repeat that desire for peace and interfaith dialogue in every appearance in the early days of his trip, which the Vatican insisted was non-political.

But his visit to Yad Vashem, Israel's national Holocaust memorial, sparked criticism by former Israeli Chief Rabbi Israel Meir Lau and Knesset speaker Reuven Rivlin, who greeted the pontiff at the museum.

"I am deeply grateful to God and to you for the opportunity to stand here in silence – a silence to remember, a silence to pray, a silence to hope," the Pope said.

The cry of those killed "echoes in our hearts. It is a cry raised against every act of injustice and violence. It is a perpetual reproach against the spilling of innocent blood."

Following the visit, in which the Pope did not enter the actual museum due to an exhibit that offers an unflattering portrayal of Pope Pius XII, who has been accused of being silent in the face of Nazi atrocities against the Jews during World War II, Rabbi Lau criticized the Pope's speech in an interview on Israel's Channel 1.

Rabbi Lau, a survivor of Buchenwald who serves as the chairman of the Yad Vashem Council, lamented that while Benedict's predecessor, Pope John Paul II, in his address at the museum nine years ago offered a moving personal expression of grief, the current Pope did not go that far, instead offering the Church's "deep compassion" for those killed in the Holocaust.

"I personally missed hearing a tone of sharing the grief," Rabbi Lau said. "I missed hearing 'I'm sorry, I apologize.'"

Rabbi Lau also said that the pontiff, who is German by birth and was a member of the Hitler Youth, did not mention the Germans, or Nazis, as those who carried out the genocide, and used the word "killed" instead of "murdered" to describe how the Jews died. And, he added, the Pope never said that six million were killed, saying only "millions."

Rivlin also criticized the Pope.

"With all due respect to the Holy See, we cannot ignore the burden he bears, as a young German who joined the Hitler Youth and as a person who joined Hitler's army, which was an instrument in the extermination," Rivlin said on Israel Radio. "He came and told us as if he were a historian, someone looking in from the sidelines, about things that should not have happened. And what can you do? He was a part of them."

Vatican spokesman Federico Lombardi fired back, noting that the Pope has denounced the Nazis and spoken of his German heritage in previous speeches, including during a visit to the Auschwitz death camp, and used the six million figure during his remarks upon arriving in Israel.

Lombardi also said four times that the Pope never served in the Hitler Youth, whose members were volunteers, but that he was forced to join anti-aircraft troops against Allied aerial raids near his hometown.

The Pope stopped an interfaith conference in Jerusalem after the head of the Palestinian sharia court accused Israel of killing women and children and urged the Pope "in the name of the one God to condemn these crimes and press the Israeli government to halt its aggression against the Palestinian people."

Criticizing the incident, a papal spokesman said, "We hope that such an incident will not damage the mission of the Pope, aiming at promoting peace and also inter-religious dialogue, as he has clearly affirmed in many occasions during this pilgrimage. We hope also that inter-religious dialogue in the Holy Land will not be compromised by this incident."

During a brief visit to the Western Wall, the Pope placed a handwritten personal prayer between the stones of the wall, asking God to "send your peace upon this Holy Land, upon the Middle East, upon the entire human family," according to a text released by the Office of the Holy See.

Following his quiet reflection at the wall, punctuated by the whirring of camera lens shutters, the Pope made a courtesy visit at the compound of the chief rabbis of Israel. He had made a similar visit to the grand mufti of Jerusalem before his wall appearance.

The Pope, who travelled with a 40-person staff and 70 reporters, and stayed at the Papal Nuncio's residence in Jerusalem during his visit, visited a Palestinian refugee camp in Bethlehem and Nazareth, where he celebrated an open-air mass.

Upon the Pope's arrival, Operation White Robe, which included 80,000 police officers and security guards, went into effect to protect him.

The Pope arrived in Israel after spending two days in Jordan, where he celebrated mass before an estimated audience of 25,000 in a soccer stadium in Amman.

He visited Mount Nebo, from where the Bible says Moses saw the Land of Israel. The Pope said the site was a reminder of "the inseparable bond between the Church and the Jewish people."

Benedict also visited the King Hussein bin Talal Mosque in Amman. He did not remove his shoes while visiting the mosque and engaged in silent reflection rather than prayer, according to reports. In a meeting there with Muslim leaders, the Pope called for a "trilateral dialogue," including the Church, to help bring Jews and Muslims together to discuss peace.

The Pope and Peres planted an olive tree at the president's residence, followed by a performance of a choir made up of Jewish and Arab girls and Israeli tenor Dudu Fisher, who sang Bring Him Home from the musical Les Miserables, minutes after the Pope met with the family of kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

"Old divisions have aged and diminished," Peres told the Pope. "So more than the need for another armoured vehicle, we need a strong, inspiring spirit to instil both the conviction that peace is attainable and the burning desire to pursue it.

"Ties of reconciliation and understanding are now being woven between the Holy See and the Jewish people," Peres added. "We cherish this process and your leadership. Our door is open to similar efforts with the Muslim world."

Ambassador's wife exhibits paintings in Tel Aviv

By MARK ELLIOTT SHAPIRO
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Clara Hirsch, an accomplished artist and wife of Canada's ambassador to Israel, Jon Allen, recently exhibited her work in the Greater Tel Aviv Area.

Hirsch's month-long show, at the Machon Hamayim gallery in Givatayim, was made up of mixed-media works – paintings that incorporated photographs, primarily of her family members. In her paintings, the geographies of Canada and Israel were combined.

The subject of the exhibit was the immigrant experience. The works focused particularly on the experience of the artist's parents and their children – Hirsch and her brother – who left post-Holocaust Europe to make their home in Canada.

One of the most fascinating elements of the exhibition is the ambiguity of the paintings. The boundaries separating the Canadian and Israeli landscapes are not clear, and the viewer is suspended in some twilight area between Canada and Israel.

Similarly, looking at the paintings, the viewer is also suspended in time, somewhere between Canada in the 1950s and contemporary Israel.

"Clara Hirsch's family was only one of many Jewish families that left eastern Europe after the war; impoverished, emotionally damaged and trying to pick up the pieces of shattered lives. The 'baggage' these Holocaust survivors carried was figuratively and mentally laden with pain and worry," the exhibit's catalogue stated.

"Hirsch's paintings create a dialogue between images from the past and her present reality. Her paintings are empathetic and moving, constructed with a careful hand, and emerge from a reservoir of gentle and conflicted emotions."

Her paintings create "a dialectic between her personal familial archive and her present environment. Her works sharply contrast her rekindled connection to her Jewish immigrant past and her life in Israel," the catalogue stated.

The exhibition's curator, Doron Polak, wrote: "William Shakespeare wrote that memory is the 'guardian of the soul' – and we, as viewers, have no choice but to join her [Hirsh] wandering and experience her feelings as they are represented by her markers in time."

Hirsch told The CJN that the exhibition is "a marking of time of my immigrant past and my present life in Israel."

She feels "very much at home in a multicultural society like Israel," she said, and through her art she tries to convey that she has "empathy for the immigrant experience."

Riot mishandled, army says

A deputy company commander was discharged from the Israeli army after his rifle discharged during a riot, killing a fellow soldier. Staff-Sgt. Noam Adin Rechter-Levy was killed during an operation in the West Bank Palestinian town of Bir Zeit on May 7. The investigation, which included a ballistic analysis, showed that Levy was killed by a bullet discharged by his deputy company commander while the latter was engaged in a physical struggle with a Palestinian rioter, according to a statement issued by the Israel Defence Forces. During the operation, dozens of Palestinian residents rioted and attacked the force. In the subsequent struggle, the commander's rifle apparently shifted, causing it to discharge, which mortally wounded Levy. The investigation found that the force's attempt to disperse the rioters was mishandled. The company commander was also disciplined and removed from any command position for the next two years.

Abdullah presses Netanyahu

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu would not declare his commitment to a two-state solution in a meeting with Jordan's king. At last week's meeting in Aqaba, King Abdullah II pushed Netanyahu to come out for a two-state solution, according to reports. The meeting preceded Netanyahu's scheduled visit to the White House this week. Abdullah was the first regional leader to meet with U.S. President Barack Obama last month. Netanyahu promised he would pursue peace talks with the Palestinians but stopped short of consenting to the request on two states. "I am aware of the need to promote negotiations with the Palestinians and intend to hold [separate] negotiations on diplomatic, security and economic [issues] negotiations, not one of which will come at the expense of the other," Netanyahu told his host. The Prime Minister's Office said the two leaders had agreed to be in contact after Netanyahu's meeting with Obama.

Katsav trial begins

Former Israeli President Moshe Katsav went on trial in Tel Aviv on sexual offence charges. Katsav was formally charged in Tel Aviv District Court on eight counts, including two counts of rape and one count of committing an indecent act using force. All the allegations involved aides when he served as minister of tourism and as president. The trial will resume Sept. 1 after the court's recess.

Israel's ancient past a must-see for visitors

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

BEIT SHE'AN, Israel — What's new in Israel these days?

How about antiquities?

Israel's hip new image may be uppermost and toppermost on the minds of Israel's travel gurus – what with the country's great restaurants, wineries, clubs, concerts and elegant seaside promenades to promote – but there's much to be said about visiting scenes of the country's ancient past.

Whether it's Jerusalem, Caesarea, Beit She'an, Tzippori, Masada or Acre (Akko) – the latter, at 1,000 years of age, the baby in this grouping – Israel's ancient sites remain an intriguing window onto the nation's past. The first four attest to the sophistication, wealth and comfort of ancient times, while the latter gives evidence to the tremendous construction and scale of the European incursion into the Holy Land during Crusader times – almost yesterday in this ancient land.

Many years ago, during a visit to Israel, I passed through Beit She'an, changing buses to take the local transportation to nearby kibbutzim to visit friends.

In recent years, however, archeologists have made it a destination in its own right, thanks to digs that have revealed a handsome Roman/Byzantine-era centre – one of the 10 cities of the Decapolis and once the most important city in northern Israel. The city was situated in the strategic corridor along the Jordan Valley and across from the Jezreel Valley, and for the Romans, it provided a good launching-off point to send soldiers in any direction to quell disturbances.

It's that Roman-era city that's on display today, though its history goes back much further. Archeologists have uncovered 19 levels of civilizations dating back 4,000 years. Students of the Bible will recall that after a battle at nearby Mount Gilboa, the residents of Beit She'an displayed the bodies of King Saul and his sons on the city walls.

Like other Roman-era cities, Beit She'an featured a main street running north/south and an east/west cross road. Shops lined either side of the collonaded street and graceful, towering columns – until recently, underground – frame both sides of the 150-metre-long Palladius Street, named after a fourth century governor.

Like other Roman cities, Beit She'an had a substantial theatre, which was built in the first century CE and seated 7,000.

The remains of bath houses, temples and shops still can be found at the site. The city's heyday came to a crashing end in 749 CE when an earthquake devastated the city. At its peak in Byzantine times, Beit She'an was home to as many as 40,000 people.

Caesarea was one of the mega-construction projects initiated by Herod 2,000 years ago. A prolific builder, he was responsible not only for the expansion and renovation of the ancient temple in Jerusalem, but he also fortified Masada, built Herodium and took a tiny Phoenician port and turned it into one of the largest ports in the world at the time. Attesting to the grandeur of the project, black and red granite was shipped from Egypt's Aswan area and marble was brought from Crete.

The city was named after Herod's Roman ally, Augustus Caesar, and was built to take advantage of trade between the Roman world and the east.

A museum in the old city shows how Caesarea appeared back in the day, with a white marble temple facing west for all incoming visitors to see, a massive hippodrome (the oval track still exists) and a semi-circular theatre that seats 15,000 spectators.

A little to the north, you can still see the remains of an aqueduct that supplied water to the city. The aqueduct – only a few hundred metres still remains – ran 17 kilometres from Mount Carmel. Tzippori is another gem that has been excavated in the Galilee, a few kilometres from Nazareth. A city that thrived in Byzantine times, it was home to large communities of Christians and Jews. A synagogue uncovered in Tzippori featured intricate and beautiful mosaic floors that included human representations as well as a Jewish zodiac.

Also known by the Greek name Sepphoris, Tzippori was in mishnaic times (sixth century CE) a centre of Jewish religious and spiritual life in the Galilee.

Akko (Acre) is another archeological marvel that bills itself as "one of the wonders of the world." The United Nations apparently agreed, naming it a World Heritage Site. Although the city predates biblical times, much of today's old city dates back only to Crusader and Ottoman periods. It is, as our local guide described it, "an open air museum."

Above ground you can visit Crusader and Ottoman quarters, a colourful suk, Turkish baths, seaside restaurants, a Baha'i temple and the Ottoman-era citadel that was used by the British as a prison. It was from that prison that in May 1947 the Irgun staged a jail break. Earlier, prisoners had tried digging their way out, only to find massive amounts of rubble and earth below, which was used to support construction of the Ottoman city above.

That area below the prison cells has now been excavated and an underground Crusader city revealed. Visitors can view a complex of halls and a church, built by the Hospitallers knights. So far, about 20,000 square metres has been excavated of the Crusader citadel, less than four per cent of the original city. "Everything is as they left it," according to a local guide, adding Akko is "the Pompeii of the Middle East."

Garfinkel play falls just short of its promise

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

You really want to like House of Many Tongues. Running at Tarragon Theatre until June 3, Jonathan Garfinkel's latest play features some sweeping themes and charismatic characters, and the dialogue rolls off the stage naturally. But the second act is marred by too many flaws to make it the five-star play it could potentially become.

House is a Middle East story pitting an Israeli man against an Arab man, both laying claim to a Jerusalem house. They squabble and point fingers, sometimes guns, and they each make a case for residing in this residence. But the house – itself a character (Fiona Highet) – is indecisive on who the rightful owner should be. The compromise between Abu Dalo (Hrant Alianak) and Shimon (Howard Jerome) acts as the meat of the play, while another more subversive plot begins to hatch.

Shimon's 15-year-old son, Alex, wants to bring peace to the Middle East, through an unusual method. Calling himself the "test-tube baby of the Dalai Lama and Woody Allen," Alex (Daniel Karasik) breezily believes oral sex exchanged between Israelis and Palestinians could broker the kind of accord the government only dreams about.

Alex's manifesto serves as the humorous counterpoint to the darker tension brooding between the adults. And by the end of the first act, you truly begin to care for Alex, his father and the poetic Arab banging away at a typewriter in the kitchen.

If only the threads of House didn't come loose in the second half. First, there's a "camel" character played by Raoul Bhaneja of Train 48 fame. There's nothing insightful or even entertaining about this role; the more snarky lines the camel spews, the more irritating he becomes.

Garfinkel – who also wrote The Trials of John Demjanjuk – throws in another adolescent for Alex to play with. Abu Dalo's gothed-out daughter feels like a jarring addition, as if the playwright desperately needs a subject for Alex's sexual experiments. She fails to be as punchy as she should be, and instead that heft is carried by Alex. Kudos to the 21-year-old Karasik for his excellent portrayal of a boy masking his pain with a flippancy every parent would recognize. He saves the brief exchanges between the two innocent teens.

Even though House doesn't live up to its early promise, fans of snappy dialogue and Jewish humour will find some shining moments in the two-hour production. All actors bring more to the stage than just Garfinkel's text, and Richard Rose's direction fleshes out personalities through touching gestures or swift glances. Best of all, Highet playing the house, offers some creative uses of opening and closing a front door.

You can't help but wonder what House could have been with some tighter editing and a punchier ending. The clunky inclusion of uninteresting characters weighs down this play, but luckily some stellar performances save it from crumbling completely. Alianak is mesmerizing as Abu Dalo, his face a map of emotions in almost every scene. Jerome delivers his woe-is-me lines with the comfort of an actor who's experienced some Jewish pain. And Niki Landau doesn't overdo her role as Alex's cousin-seduction target.

Vancouver musician pays tribute to Pete Seeger

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

What could be more perfect than singer/guitarist Michael Friedman performing at a Pete Seeger tribute concert? After all, Friedman has known Seeger since he was two years old.

"Way back in the 1950s, my father had a little folk group and my parents helped organize concerts for Pete Seeger, Earl Robinson and others from the United States folk movement. Pete and Earl were blacklisted under the House Un-American Activities Committee, so our house became sort of a whistle stop for travelling musicians," Friedman recalled in a phone interview.

"I used to get kicked out of my bedroom so my Uncle Perry, a folksinger and aspiring banjo player, could cop some banjo licks from Pete."

Michael Friedman

In celebration of legendary folksinger and activist Pete Seeger's 90th birthday, the Winchevsky Centre in Toronto is hosting a gala concert – For Pete's Sake Sing! – featuring Friedman on Saturday, May 30 at 7:30 p.m.

The program includes a sing-along hootenanny by musicians of the Camp Naivelt community. The music program at the labour Zionist Ontario summer camp was instrumental in the development of folk music in Canada and some of the country's best known musicians got their start there.

Seeger, an ambassador for peace and social justice, turned 90 on May 3. Through timeless songs, he engaged people in causes to end the Vietnam War, ban nuclear weapons and promote ecological responsibility and international solidarity.

"Pete was one of my biggest inspirations – aside from rock 'n' roll – in the '60s. He had the amazing capacity to bring multiple generations together in song. Seeger was a bridge builder," said the Vancouver-based musician.

"I don't think there's a single act on the musical stage that I've seen more than Pete – whenever he came to town, we were there."

When Seeger toured countries like Turkey or Nigeria, he would sing in the audience's native language and later perform their songs in North America for audiences to learn.

At the upcoming concert, Friedman will perform Seeger's greatest hits, Where Have All the Flowers Gone?, If I Had a Hammer and We Shall Overcome, a song Seeger co-wrote.

"We're living in interesting times, so Seeger's songs still ring true," Friedman said.

Friedman will also perform some of his own songs using his "new" acoustic guitar approach of altered tuning, picking, strumming, harmonics and tapping – techniques advanced by renowned guitarists Michael Hedges and Leo Codkey.

Currently, Friedman performs both as a solo act and with band members Mark James Fortin and Don Alder, and with British Columbia's Corbin Keep, who is known as the Wild Cellist because of the diversity of his music. When on tour, Friedman plays with German cellist Jens Naumilkat, who arranges Friedman's songs for his performances with philharmonic and chamber orchestras. Friedman's latest CD is Diamond Space (2006), and a new CD is in the works.

In 1992, Friedman became the music director of CBC's Front Page Challenge when the Toronto-based production moved out west. He wrote 120 music compositions for it.

"I had done some film work, but there I wrote instrumental underscore for one-to-two-minute mini-documentaries about surprise guests like Maggie Trudeau, Robert Kennedy Jr. and Sylvie Fréchette. Each week, I had a few days to get the music ready. That did wonders for my song writing – it was an amazing three years," he said.

Tickets for the performance are $15 in advance and $20 at the door, with reduced rates for members. Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave. Visit www.winchevskycentre.org or call 416-789-5502, or go to www.michaelfriedman.ca.

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

When David Briskin moved to Toronto to become the music director and principal conductor of the National Ballet of Canada in 2006, he thought moving here would allow him to slow down a bit. But that's not the case.

He is currently working on the full-length romantic ballet Giselle, at the Four Seasons Centre for the Performing Arts from May 27 to 31.

Following that, he immediately goes to work on a mixed bill of Bizet's Carmen, choreographed by Davide Bombana, and Skin Divers, based on Anne Michaels' book of poetry of the same name and choreographed by Canadian Dominique Dumais. Carmen and Skin Divers will be performed at the Four Seasons Centre from June 6 to 14.

"Working with the National Ballet is everything and more than I expected. The dancers are wonderful and the orchestra is fantastic," Briskin said. "I do a lot of guest conducting with major North American ballet companies, and our orchestra can compete with any of these and, in some cases, is even better."

He said that when he joined the National, he was also interested in working with Karen Kain, the ballet's artistic director.

Briskin said the acoustics in the Four Seasons Centre are very honest and that it raises the level of performance because everything is so clearly heard and seen in the house. He added that the players can hear one another almost better than any other orchestra pit that he's ever worked in.

Briskin, 48, lived in New York City for 23 years, so it was a big change to come to Toronto, but he felt the opportunity to become music director of the National Ballet was too good to pass up. He moved here with wife, Julia, and their daughter, Charlotte, now 3.

"My wife and I were ready for a change of lifestyle and to get out of Manhattan," Briskin said. "We love it, we feel very comfortable living in Cedarvale, a little pocket just south of Eglinton and west of Bathurst."

David Briskin

Briskin was born in Milwaukee, Wis., and raised in Newton, Mass., where the family attended Temple Shalom. His brother, Charles Briskin, is now a Reform rabbi in San Pedro, Calif.

Briskin, who started playing the piano at the age of five, served as conductor with the American Ballet Theatre and has been a regular guest conductor with the San Francisco Ballet and with the New York City Ballet. He's conducted the orchestras of the Houston Ballet, the Joffrey Ballet of Chicago and Les Grands Ballets Canadiens de Montréal. He was also the conductor of the Juilliard School's dance division.

In July 2008, he was appointed director of orchestral studies at the University of Toronto faculty of music and conductor of the University of Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

"It has been wonderful deepening our roots in Toronto and to have some influence on the training of young Canadian musicians is fantastic, because they will ultimately fill the seats of our orchestras," Briskin said.

Tel Aviv U students produced 'staggering' films, says Atom Egoyan

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Critically acclaimed Canadian filmmaker Atom Egoyan lent his name to the 2009 Toronto Jewish Film Festival late last month at a screening of two films associated with Tel Aviv University's world-renowned film program.

The Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University (TAU) and the TJFF, which ended on April 26, hosted a reception and screening at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Grande, with Egoyan as the special guest.

Before the two films – one a short, by TAU alum Elite Zexer titled Take Note, and the other, a full-length film by award-winning filmmaker and TAU film professor Eitan Green titled It All Begins At Sea – were screened before a packed movie theatre, the focus of the evening was decidedly on the Israeli school's film program.

Egoyan, last year's winner of the Dan David Prize (a $1-million prize awarded for outstanding contributions in the fields of science, humanities and the arts) for his film Ararat, about the Armenian genocide, spoke about his experience at TAU.

He said while he was there last year to receive the award, he spent some time with the school's film students.

"This campus, for those of you who haven't been there, is exceptional. It's beautifully designed. It makes you feel like this is the hub of intellectual life in the country, and it was really thrilling to be there," said Egoyan, adding he's visited Israel a number of times since 1988.

"The calibre of the shorts that I saw from the student group was staggering," he said.

Atom Egoyan

Having spent a lot of time in film schools around the world, Egoyan said he noticed that TAU's film school produces filmmakers who have very distinctive styles.

"There was no overall style that the instructors imposed upon their students, and Israel is, of course, an extraordinarily complex country and many of the shorts are dealing with the realities of the country," said Egoyan, who also presented a trailer for his latest film, Adoration, which was inspired by a true story about a Palestinian man who planted a bomb on his pregnant Irish girlfriend before she boarded an El Al flight.

"I would say that this is not only one of the most important schools in the country, but one of the most important schools in the world," Egoyan said.

Green, who teaches script writing, film directing and film analysis at TAU, said he is proud of Zexer, who wrote and directed a 14-minute film about a newly arrived Russian immigrant and Israeli soldier who struggles to assert her authority as a boot camp commander.

He said that not all the film students at TAU will become great writers or directors, but at the very least, the students will be better able to appreciate film.

"We created a better audience for the arts, better audience for the movies and that is as important," said Green, who won the Innovation Award at the 2008 Montreal World Film Festival for It All Begins At Sea.

His 90-minute dark comedy is split into three scenes that focus on the lives of a young Israeli family, the Goldsteins – Yehuda, a furniture salesman; his wife, Dina, and their son, Udi.

It's a semi-autobiographical family drama about the vulnerability of being a parent and a coming-of-age story about love and mortality.

In the first scene, The Sea, Dina and Udi almost drown after they are caught in an undertow off a beach in Ashkelon.

The second scene, The Wall, is set six years later. Udi, is 12 years old and on a school field trip when he falls off a short cliff and cracks his head open.

In the third scene, Home, Udi is two years older and fully recovered, and his parents are expecting another child, a baby girl. They've just moved into a new apartment that has a view of the hospital that his parents are constantly in and out of due to Dina's difficult pregnancy.

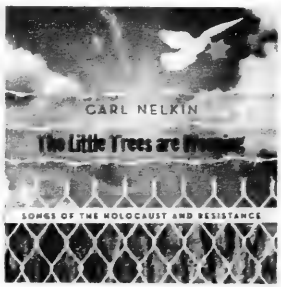
Egoyan, who introduced Green's film, said it is "such an emotional piece of work, it is also adventurous, it's playing with structure, you'll see amazing shifts in tone, which are conducted so masterfully, and it is really a very mature, masterful piece of work."

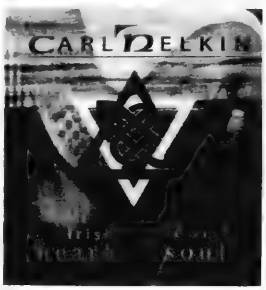
Singer blends Jewish and Irish songs

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

Carl Nelkin is a man of unusual talents and an undauntable personality. He is also an accomplished singer.

Nelkin is a lawyer by professional training, specializing in the rather rare metier of aviation law. He is a Jewish community activist and public affairs spokesperson in Dublin, Ireland, where he and his family have lived for nearly two centuries. He is also a poised professional singer and, more to the purpose of this article, a cantor as well.





He sings, obviously, to give voice to the stirrings of his soul. I suspect as well that he sings to pay homage to the two cultures in which he is deeply rooted: Jewish and Irish.

That is the only conclusion possible after listening to the CD Nelkin recorded some six years ago, Irish Heart-Jewish Soul.

The album is a unique collection of Jewish and Irish tunes. Half of the album's 14 songs are familiar Yiddish melodies; the other half are Irish folk tunes, undoubtedly familiar in the Irish world.

The Jewish-Yiddish tunes are sung to stylized Irish-Celtic musical accompaniment. The Irish-Celtic songs are sung with a discernible nod of the singer's cap to Jewish-Yiddish sensibilities. It is a fortuitous combination. In the main, the music is fun to listen to because the fusion of the two cultures and sounds are a pleasant fit.

Nelkin's voice is gentle. It does not overpower. Nor does he ever rush or attack the phrasing and lyric of the songs. He sings rather, with a tender deference to the poetic and musical intent of the composer. His cantorial training is noticeable in the palpable humility with which he approaches the sway of the music. This is especially evident in Nelkin's second CD, The Little Trees Are Weeping – Songs of the Holocaust and Resistance, which was recorded earlier this year.

Nelkin is not aggressive with the lyrics. There is no need to be because the songs themselves are "aggressive" with our sensibilities.

Only a few of the 14 songs of Little Trees will be familiar to the listener. Many of the songs are original works that were written in the ghettos and concentration camps.

Listening to The Little Trees are Weeping evokes an entirely different emotional response than does listening to Irish Heart-Jewish Soul. The latter is an excursion through the hybrid folkways of Jewish immigrants exploring Ireland. The latter is an excursion through a horribly sorrowful history.

That these CDs do evoke emotions, however, is a tribute to the rare stylings of the Jewish-Irish songster-cantor Carl Nelkin.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

"I do not know of a single woman in Yiddish literature who wrote better than she did," Isaac Bashevis Singer once commented about the little-known novelist and story writer Esther Kreitman, whose 1936 book, The Dance of the Demons, has just been reissued by the Feminist Press of New York.

In truth, Singer might have done much more to encourage Kreitman's literary efforts, since she was his older sister by 13 years. Their younger brother, Israel Joshua Singer, also became one of Yiddish literature's bright lights. Like the celebrated Bronte family of English literary fame, the Singer family of Bilgoraj and later Warsaw, Poland, produced three remarkable writers whose shared upbringing by a mystically inclined rabbinical father and a sternly rationalistic and commonsensical mother has come under scrutiny by generations of critics and biographers.

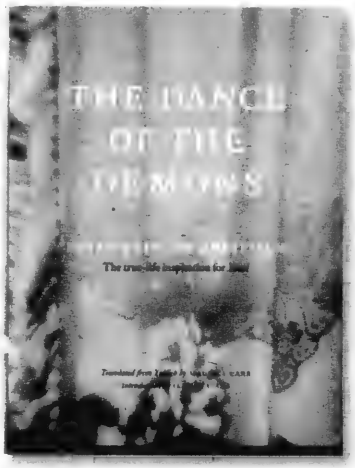
Esther Kreitman

If the Bronte comparison does not acknowledge the special difficulties often faced by women writers – difficulties that, in Kreitman's case, seemed to draw her to the edge of madness – Michigan professor Anita Norich offers a more apt comparison. "Perhaps only in the case of William, Henry and Alice James do we have a comparable set of siblings who enjoyed very different reputations as literati and intellectuals," she writes. The Jameses, like the Singers, produced two towering literary-intellectual brothers (psychologist William and writer Henry) and a long-suffering and neglected sister (the bedridden diarist Alice).

Kreitman's first novel, Der Sheydims' Tants (Dance of the Demons), was published in Yiddish in Poland in 1936, and in English translation (titled Deborah) in 1946. A second novel, Brilyantn (Diamonds) appeared in 1944 and a book of short stories, Yikhes (Lineage) came out in 1949. Unhappy, unstable, and said to be either epileptic or possessed by dybbuks, Kreitman died in London in 1954. Although her works received favourable critical attention, she remained an obscure talent, overshadowed by her famous brothers. So eclipsed was her reputation that literary critic Irving Howe, who must have known better, felt it safe to write in 1980 that "there are two Singers in Yiddish literature, and while both are very good, they sing in different keys."

Born in Bilgoraj in 1891, Kreitman was brought up with little expectation that a woman could or should be anything other than a good wife and homemaker. In Dance of the Demons, which is largely autobiographical, the young daughter Deborah listens as her rabbinical father, Reb Avram Ber, praises her brother as a brilliant Talmudist in the making, then asks him to predict her own future. "What are you going to be one day? Nothing, of course!" he replies. In his heart of hearts, Reb Avram believes that his wife's parents had erred in allowing his wife to become educated, and he is determined not to repeat the mistake with his daughter. (Israel Joshua Singer once recounted a real-life episode in which Esther asked their mother what she could be when she grew up, and was told, "What can a girl be?" He added that he understood why his sister often seemed intensely jealous of him.)

Dance of the Demons follows Reb Avram Ber and family through their years of poverty and devoted religious service in several small towns, exposing the hypocrisies of feeble-minded townsfolk who elevate their undeserving rabbi into a saintlike "tsadik" and the cynicism of a younger generation that turns from religion to socialism, all in search of a golden calf. Eventually the provincial family lands in the big degraded metropolis of Warsaw, with its unwashed and unlearned Jews and Jewish criminal gangs. As a sort of precursor to the beit din depicted so vividly in I. B. Singer's In My Father's Court, Reb Avram also maintains a rabbinical court in which he untangles some extraordinary predicaments, such as the dilemma of a Jewish thug whose daughter has two husbands and a baby almost due.



Reb Avram is soon facing a thorny dilemma of his own: his daughter's growing reluctance to go through with an arranged marriage, which becomes the central drama of the novel. Deborah, bitterly unhappy but still dutiful, is convinced that her feelings don't count and the match is merely her family's way of getting rid of her once and for all. "From that day onward she felt like a stranger in the house – a superfluous stranger. Her father, her mother, her brother – she regarded them all as acquaintances who were accommodating her as an unwanted guest and were looking forward to the hour of her departure. She began to look forward to it herself. That sense of resignation, oppressive and bewildering, never took leave of her no matter where she went or what she did."

Again, Kreitman's art mirrored her life; the story is based on her own arranged marriage to a man she had never met, a doomed match that produced a single son, Morris Kreitman (who, as Maurice Carr, became the novel's translator). In real life, as Esther and family journeyed by train to meet her intended husband, she showed her mother some of her writings: her mother ordered her to tear them up and throw them out the window.

In her book Isaac Bashevis Singer: A Life, psychoanalyist Janet Hadda accuses the Nobel laureate writer of cold-hearted neglect of his sister, claiming that he ignored her pleas for funds and refused to help her relocate to America. Bashevis visited her only once in the postwar era. "When I came to London, she was weirdly glad to see me," he later recalled. "She loved me with a great love that often seemed to me exaggerated and frightening… Even those who could not get along with her praised her goodheartedness and refinement. But who can live with a volcano? After a few days of listening to her complaints and blame, I became weary. She could literally drive a person crazy."

Despite the lifetime of neglect she endured from her family and the world at large, there is no question that Kreitman's legend lives on in I. B. Singer's fiction. She was his model for the title character in his story Yentl, about a girl who masquerades as a male yeshiva student in order to get an education (later made into a film starring Barbra Streisand). Kreitman may also have served as the model for other passionate and unstable females in I. B.'s fiction, from Masha in Enemies: A Love Story to Magda in The Magician of Lublin.

As a novel, Dance of the Demons stands up well as a truthful and delicate portrait of memorable characters caught in the grip of dramatically changing times that saw the beginning of the dissolution of shtetl life; the book ends on the cusp of World War I. A worthy and interesting writer, Kreitman holds special significance for being a woman operating in a somewhat closed male shop. Would The Dance of The Demons have been rescued from obscurity even if she had been unrelated to the Singers? One would hope so. But her work and legend are so intricately interwoven with those of her famous brothers that the question seems impossible to answer.

Managing water resources in Mideast

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — There's no question that under any future peace deal, "large volumes of water will be transferred from Israel to the Palestinians," says Canadian water expert David Brooks of Ottawa.

In 2007, Brooks was retained by an Israeli-Palestinian environmental organization, Friends of the Earth Middle East (FEME), to "draft an article for an eventual peace treaty" between Israel and the Palestinians pertaining to water resources.

"The tough question to be answered is whether water will be transferred under an Israeli-managed system or whether there will be joint-management of water [by Israel and a future Palestinian state]?" Brooks said in an interview with The CJN.

Brooks said he favours "joint-management."

Followed the signing of the Oslo accords in 1993, Brooks served on Canadian delegations to the multilateral working groups of the Middle East peace talks on water and the environment.

Brooks, a senior adviser on water to Friends of the Earth Canada, said he was contacted in 2007 by FEME, co-chaired by Israeli Gideon Bromberg and Palestinian Nadis Al Khatib, because the organization wanted "to re-invigorate the Geneva accords" signed by former MK Yossi Beilin and Palestinian leader Yasir Abd Rabbo in October 2003.

Since 2007, Brooks has worked with Canadian Julie Trottier, a lecturer in politics at Newcastle University in the United Kingdom, on the water issue.

"Over the course of a year, we came up with a draft agreement that is a design for joint management of water resources by Israel and a future Palestinian state," he said.

Brooks said that his discussions about water resources "have been mediated by the Czechoslovakian government… They brought me together with the Palestinian Water Authority at a conference in Prague [in 2008]."

According to Brooks, about 2/3 of water in the land that comprises Israel and a future Palestinian state is "trans-border water" that would have to be "shareable." This is because the "intake" locations of the water, where the rain falls, and the "out take" locations, where it comes out as natural springs, would be in different states.

Brooks, a co-author of Watershed: The role of Fresh Water in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, said that currently, "neither Israel nor the Palestinians are using water sustainably. Both sides are using too much water."

He said "the Palestinian government, not Israel, is at fault" for depleting Gaza's water resources.

"In Gaza, water has been very badly managed… They [both Hamas and the PA before it] have allowed everyone whose wanted to drill a well to do so. This reduces the pressure and has allowed sea water to come in… Today there is not enough water left that is of drinking quality in Gaza. But that's the Palestinians' own doing."

In the West Bank, Brooks said, "water has been highly inequitably controlled" in favour of Israel. "Palestinians are not short of drinking water, but there has been a strangulation of Palestinian agriculture."

One of the "greatest mistakes Israel has made is not ensuring a vigorous Palestinian agriculture," Brooks said.

He added that although Israel is gradually leaving agriculture in favour of developing a high-tech economy, Palestinians "can't go through that process instantaneously… Agriculture is a good way of using the large supply of Palestinian labour."

Brook's proposal for water management in an eventual peace treaty is based on "an ongoing negotiations strategy between Israel and Palestine, meaning every year you work out a process and decide who gets how much water… It's based on an ongoing relationship of good faith and isn't something you do once and forever, but you have to do it on an ongoing basis."

That's because "water isn't like real estate… it can't be divided once and for all… because water moves… it can be used many times and recycled, it changes in quality, so a different management regime must be considered."

Diminutive London forward plays with pizzazz

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When your team has a player the likes of John Tavares in the lineup, it can be difficult to grab some attention for yourself.

A highly touted, likely first overall selection in the upcoming National Hockey League entry draft, Tavares is often the guy other teams focus on when the London Knights come to town.

But the past edition of the Knights have another line to contend with, one that features a former player with the Israeli national junior team.

During the playoffs, Daniel Erlich played on a line with Nazem Kadri and Phil Varone, and as far as Erlich is concerned, "both lines are good enough to be first lines on any other team."

Well, most teams, but perhaps not the Windsor Spitfires, who eliminated the Knight four games to one – all decided in overtime – in the Ontario Hockey League's conference finals.

Nevertheless, Erlich is correct in pointing out the Knights didn't rely on a single big line. In 14 playoff games, Erlich lit up the scoreboard for two goals and 11 assists. (In 67 regular season games, he scored 18 goals and added 35 assists.) During the playoffs, Kadri had nine goals and 12 assists, while Varone had 10 goals and nine assists. Tavares had 21 playoff points.

"I'm the playmaker," Erlich told The CJN after his season ended. "The other guys know how to score.

"All of us are pretty hard workers. When we get going, it's pretty hard to contain us."

What makes the line so unique is not just the complementary skills each brings to the ice. The fact that Erlich is a Jew whose parents are Israeli, Kadri a Muslim of Lebanese descent and Varone possesses an Italian heritage hasn't failed to attract attention.

Sun media quoted Knights assistant coach Pat Curcio saying, "Who knew a Muslim, an Israeli and an Italian could work magic together on the ice like that? I don't know if it's going to lead to world peace or anything like that, and the kids certainly don't talk about it, but it's a good story from a world perspective in that three hockey players from these different backgrounds are doing well together."

The players, however, downplay the ethnic angle. "It doesn't matter where you come from," said Erlich. "We're great friends. It doesn't matter what religion you are."

Erlich, who is five-foot-six, 155 pounds, acknowledges, "I'm not the biggest guy out there." But he is quick and his speed permits him "to get away from the big guys. It makes it hard to catch me."

Mark Hunter, vice-president and general manager of the Knights, said Erlich "could be one of the most entertaining players in the OHL. He plays with a lot of pizzazz.

"He can skate, pass the puck, handle the puck."

Three years ago at age 15, Erlich joined the Israeli national junior team for an International Ice Hockey Federation tournament in Romania. The diminutive forward, who attended and played for Associated Hebrew Schools, carried the Israelis on his back that year, all the way to a silver medal, scoring 12 goals and 14 assists in five games and being named tournament MVP.

His coach, Jean Perron, former bench boss with the Montreal Canadiens, said at the time, "He's quite a good player. For his age, he's probably the best I've seen play that type of hockey."

Erlich played for the juniors at another tournament in Hungary. "Those were great experiences," he said. "I was proud to play for Israel."

That was then. This year, as an 18-year-old, Erlich is eligible for the NHL entry draft. "If I'm drafted, it would be an honour and it would be great."

However, his stature could be a problem. Hunter, who had a long NHL career with Montreal, St. Louis and other teams, said Erlich knows his size works against him. Nevertheless, he does have a good chance at a pro career, even if it isn't in the NHL.

"He competes, he's gritty, he hits people. He can handle the puck well."

Erlich is hoping for a free agent tryout with an NHL club next fall. His goal remains to some day play in the NHL, but if not, European hockey or perhaps the American Hockey League or East Coast Hockey League beckon.

There are some precedents for players of his size and skill level to play in the big league. Brian Gionta and Martin St. Louis are two he points to with relish. "I look up to them as successful players," Erlich said.

Maccabiah masters squash team has opening

Compiled by CJN Staff

They are seeking a credible player in the 50-55 age category (or even someone 45-50) who is willing to spend two weeks in Israel this summer competing with Jewish players from around the world.

The team currently consists of Paul Lechtzier and Ed Rosenblat, but for the Canadian masters to record a team score, a third player is required.

The masters division in the Maccabiah Games consists of athletes 35 and older who pay their own way to Israel ($7,500) for the chance to compete in the quadrennial games. This year's Maccabiah Games, the 18th, run from July 12 to 23. Canada will send its largest team ever – 450 athletes.

For more information, contact squash coach Patrick Hartunian at 647-229-0901 or Sharon Lohr Petersil, national office director for Maccabi Canada, at 416-398-0515.

Dinner and drinks?

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

"So what exactly did he say?" I ask my husband, Meir.

"For the 97th time," he said, "'Why won't you come over at, say, seven?'"

I look at him, disappointed.

You see, we were invited to the home of this lovely couple that we met recently at a party. We talked twice over the phone and the chemistry was there, and two days ago, Jay called and invited us over.

The problem is, he didn't say whether it was a dinner invitation or not.

"Couldn't you just ask him?! If he had talked with me, I would've definitely asked," I said to Meir.

Leave these things to men! Sheesh!

He hands me the phone.

"Be my guest," he says.

So we don't know. I mean, if Linda and Jay were Israelis, I wouldn't have hesitated to ask them specifically about dinner, but Canadians? They might take offence.

I don't really understand Canadians yet. You see, I've only been here for 18 months.

"Anyway, let's not eat too much during the day. And I'm gonna buy them a nice present, too," I say.

"They must have invited us to dinner. I'm sure they have!" I add confidently.

Meir says nothing

"Right?" Still, he says nothing.

While we're eating a very light lunch at the mall, I'm thinking about Linda and Jay. Such a nice couple. And they look generous, too.

They'll probably prepare us some mighty fine delicacies, I think to myself. I imagine a bevy of salads, nice juicy ribs, grilled chicken, desserts – oh, the desserts. I love this couple so much!

We finish up our meagre sandwiches and run to a posh store, where we throw away an irrational amount of money on a lovely bowl, then rush back home, wrap it in beautiful wrapping paper, then sit and wait until 7 p.m.

We stand excitedly on their threshold promptly at 7, and when the door is opened, I immediately feel the horror coiling in my soul.

There's no happy table, no nice tablecloth, no cutlery or plates, and no food. Only small miserable glasses, and a shameless plate with almonds in it.

Linda smiles at us and takes my costly gift.

"Now, what have we got here?" she asks while unwrapping it.

I snap out of my hunger-induced stupor and cry: "You can put a whole bunch of food in this dish! Like cold pasta salads, or mashed potatoes with fried onions, or mushrooms with cream, or…"

Meir gives me an angry look, and I clam up.

"Please, have some almonds," Jay offers generously as we sit down. He even pours some liqueur. We polish off the almonds in a heartbeat and start downing the booze.

"Thank God!" my eyes say to Meir's. "Finally, they'll feed us!"

When Jay enters with more chilled drinks, Meir needs to hold me so I don't collapse.

We keep drinking while Jay talks for hours about the state of the economy.

When he gets to the part about poor hungry people, we tune back in.

Our hosts seem wistful, even shocked. "Leave?" Linda asks. "But we haven't had dinner yet!"

And at that point, she opens the doors to the dining room to reveal a table full of steaming dishes.

"You were enjoying your drinks so much, we didn't want to rush you." Linda says.

By the way, there's a rumor circulating: apparently, we're drinkers.

MANGO RADICCHIO CAPRESE SALAD WITH BASIL VINAIGRETTE

1/3 c chopped fresh basil +8 whole basil leaves
3 tblsp olive oil
2 tblsp white balsamic vinegar
8 radicchio leaves, thick ends trimmed
2 lg mangoes, peeled, halved, thinly sliced
8 1/4" slices fresh mozzarella cheese

Blend chopped basil, oil, and vinegar in mini processor until most of basil is pureed. Season with salt and pepper. Overlap radicchio, mangoes, cheese, and basil leaves on plates. Drizzle with vinaigrette. Serve, passing remaining vinaigrette.

The new fitness craze

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

The warm weather has finally arrived and the best way to get fit and enjoy our wonderful but short summer is with aquafitness.

I'm sure you've heard of it. When I did my research for last month's article, I learned that the American Medical Association listed aquafitness as the best exercise to help strengthen and stretch your entire body, no matter what your health condition, age or fitness level.

Aquafitness is basically aerobic training in the water without any impact on or damage to your joints. The water acts like a cushion for the joints in your spine, hips, knees and ankles. It supports your back and forces you to use your core muscles while building strength. It gives you the feeling of weightlessness, but there is great resistance from the water.

This is a great way not only to build muscle strength, but also to improve cardiovascular health – not to mention that it can be lots of fun.

Originally, aquafitness was designed for rehabilitation after injury or surgery, as well as to increase mobility in physically challenged people. It has grown in popularity, and now, classes are offered at every fitness level, in places varying from your local community centre to special aquafit facilities that are popping up everywhere. Private instruction is also available.

You don't have to be a good swimmer to participate, and you can choose whether you want to do the exercises in the deep or the shallow end of the pool. Just walking around in the shallow end or treading water for five to 10 minutes in the deep end is a great way to promote circulation and build muscle and core strength. It's that easy.

Stretching in a pool can help loosen tight and sore muscles and increase circulation, especially in a warm pool. Since you are weightless in water, your muscles open up more easily, giving you a deeper stretch. And exercising in the water minimizes the delayed onset muscle soreness that usually comes after any good workout.

URBAN WRITER

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I don't write about it often, but when I do, it's because I'm extra excited about the Jewish world's accomplishments through tikkun olam.

Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee has turned 13. Over the years, we have worked hard to create an organization that encourages all Jews to play a role in tikkun olam. Through this effort, we have garnered much support from the Toronto Jewish community, as well as from people across Canada and internationally. We have programs and partners in Israel, Zimbabwe, Guyana and Argentina, and have close relationships with Native Canadian, Christian and Muslim groups.

Over the last year, Ve'ahavta has sent close to $1-million worth of pharmaceuticals to organizations such as the Howard Hospital in Zimbabwe. This is amazing, as the country has virtually collapsed. Our work with this medical clinic, together with local philanthropist Bert Amato, has ensured that at least one Zimbabwean medical facility is well stocked, while poverty, government corruption and HIV/AIDS continues to chip away at the rest of the country. The Jewish community should be proud of this success.

Ve'ahavta, together with Congregation Habonim, continues to travel the streets of Toronto in our homeless van and celebrate Pesach's second-night seder with those living on or near the street.

This year, we launched our ninth Creative Writing Contest (CWC) for the Homeless. We have received more than 100 submissions. Some of the pieces are written at a professional level, but all of them open the readers' minds and hearts to the tragic lives of our brothers and sisters living on the streets of this very wealthy city.

Following is an excerpt from a submission: "I dug my hands into the thick of the sheets spread out beneath me, my teeth clenched, my body braced itself for the blow that was about to come. I drew a breath in anticipation: is this all I'm worth? I lay before him a fragile girl, innocent, naive. A child so young should be allowed to wear childhood. I could not."

Last year, writer Michael Ondaatje was a judge for the CWC. This year, former British prime minister Tony Blair and former Canadian politician Belinda Stronach, a philanthropist who is also executive vice-chairman of Magna International, will be judges. Ve'ahavta was able to secure their services because of our involvement with the Tony Blair Foundation and Belinda Stronach Foundation's fight against malaria in Africa.

Ve'ahavta is still Canada's only Jewish humanitarian organization. Thirteen years into our existence, we have worked in Israel, Toronto, Kingston, Ottawa, El Salvador, Honduras, Cuba and Turkey, as well as other places mentioned in this article. We have trained Canadian troops in crisis response, and activist Elie Wiesel and the wife of slain Jewish journalist Daniel Pearl, Mariane, have been keynote speakers at our annual gala, Starry Knights.

Ve'ahavta's dynamic staff, board and volunteers have raised more than $10 million and an equal amount in goods-in-kind. We have facilitated thousands of volunteer opportunities locally; in orphanages in Honduras; following the tsunami in Sri Lanka and in other locations.

Ve'ahavta staff drove a convoy of school buses to El Salvador, where we delivered humanitarian aid. We gave the buses to five villages. Through all of this, we have made friends with many non-Jewish communities and effectively played a role in countering anti-Semitism.

Our hope is that the people of the world will eventually lay down their guns and elect to create together, so wars and a gross disparity of resources will no longer be the reality. Is that goal achievable? Rabbi Nachman of Breslov said, "If you can destroy then you can create." So, yes, we believe it is very do-able. Thank you for joining us! "If you will it, it is no dream." – Theodore Herzl

COMMUNITY WALKS FOR ISRAEL: An estimated 12,000 people, including politicians representing Canada's three major parties, took part in UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual Walk with Israel on Sunday. The event raised about $400,000 to help integrate Ethiopian Israelis in Bat Yam and to fund educational and social welfare projects for Ethiopians in the Bat Yam and Eilat/Eilot areas. Please see page 18 for more photos.

Kenney blasts 'dangerous' anti-Semitism

By RAPHAEL AHREN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A "new anti-Semitism" that emanates from an alliance of western leftists and Islamic extremists is more dangerous than the "old European" form of Jew-hatred, Jason Kenney, Canada's minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism said on Sunday as he wound up a four-day trip to Israel.

"The existential threat faced by Israel on a daily basis is ultimately a threat to the broader western civilization," said Kenney, explaining the staunchly pro-Israel positions of the Canadian government.

"It's a threat that comes from profoundly undemocratic forces that don't have the same conception of human dignity or freedom, and which abuse Israel as a kind of representative of the broader West and western liberal-democratic values," Kenney said.

"I also very acutely understand the nature of the new anti-Semitism, and I think it's even more dangerous than the old European anti-Semitism."

Kenney said many anti-Israel attacks come from adherents of a form of anti-Semitism who appear to view a Jewish homeland as illegitimate.

"Israel is not perfect, obviously," Kenney said. "Israelis should be the first to admit that. But we acknowledge that so much of the criticism Israel faces is motivated by a dangerous form of anti-Semitism that tries to hide behind anti-Zionism and is represented by a coalition of the far left in the West with extreme currents of jihadi Islam that seek the destruction of the Jewish nation. They seem to believe that the Jewish people are the only people in the world that don't have a right to a homeland."

The 40-year-old, who earlier this month was elected Canada's "best overall MP" by fellow parliamentarians, prides himself on being responsible for his country's decision to shun the recent United Nations-sponsored Durban II conference on racism, based on fears it would be misused as a platform for unfair criticism of Israel.

Gay Event Criticized

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada last week urged gays and lesbians to reject an anti-Israel program in Toronto. "Queers Against Israeli Apartheid" was to be held May 23 to "reignite Toronto's queer community in the fight against apartheid," the Ontario Public Interest Research Group said on its website. "Israel has now begun to frame itself as a tolerant, queer-positive democracy. This can never be reality under occupation." The keynote speaker was to be El-Farouk Khaki, co-founder of Salaam: Queer Muslim Community and Toronto's Pride 2009 Grand Marshall. B'nai Brith said it's "the height of irony to single out democratic Israel" while gay rights "in neighbouring Arab countries are routinely trampled on."

Medical Ethicist Dies

NEW YORK — Gerald Wolpe, a renowned rabbi and medical ethicist, died May 18 at age 81 after battling pancreatic cancer. As spiritual leader of the 1,500-family Har Zion Temple in Philadelphia for 30 years, until his resignation in 1999, he became a leading voice in medical ethics and caregiving, a field he became interested in during the 1960s, but became personally invested in after his late wife suffered brain aneurysms.

Boycott Battle

EDINBURGH — An Israeli filmmaker said she'll attend a Scottish film festival despite threats of a boycott. Ken Loach, a prominent British film director, called for a boycott of next month's Edinburgh International Film Festival after it accepted an Israeli state grant to fly Tali Shalom-Ezer to the festival to screen her film, Surrogate. The festival returned the money, but offered to fund her flight at its own expense. Loach said he was OK with Israeli filmmakers attending. Shalom-Ezer said she would attend, but reproached Loach as a "racist" and expressed concern the controversy would keep people from going to see her film, which depicts the relationship between a patient and a woman treating him with sexual therapy

Black Female Rabbi

CINCINNATI — The first African-American female rabbi will take up a pulpit in North Carolina in August. Alysa Stanton, who will be ordained June 6 at Cincinnati's Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion, will be spiritual leader of Congregation Bayt Shalom in Greenville, a small Conservative shul that two years ago also affiliated with the Reform movement. Stanton, a convert and mother of a daughter, 14, is a psychotherapist who specializes in grief and trauma. She'll be the first black rabbi to lead a majority white shul.

Yeshiva For Women To Open In Fall

NEW YORK — Rabbi Avi Weiss has launched a yeshiva to train Orthodox women to "function as rabbis."

Known as Yeshiva Maharat, it's expected to open in September and will offer women part-time instruction in all areas of Jewish law, pastoral training and a synagogue internship. Its name is taken from an invented title conferred in March upon Sara Hurwitz, previously "spiritual mentor" at Rabbi Weiss' shul, the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale. Maharat is a Hebrew acronym that stands for spiritual, halachic and Torah leader.

"We're training women to be rabbis," Hurwitz told the Forward. "What they will be called is something we're working out."

Rabbi Weiss was said to be considering calling Hurwitz a rabbi, at the urging of several Orthodox feminist leaders. The Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance called her "ordination" and the new school "historic." Hurwitz admitted that graduates of the new program may have trouble getting jobs. Only a handful of Orthodox shuls employ women in positions as more or less as the equal of male rabbis, except for performing public ritual roles in worship services.

"You have to start somewhere," Hurwitz told JTA.

Magazine Pulled

Community body to probe tensions at York U

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish volunteers and students have formed a commission to address the increase in anti-Jewish and anti-Israel incidents during the last academic year at York University.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and Hillel of Greater Toronto are behind the 10-person commission, called the Quality of Life for Jewish Students at York University, which is being chaired by UJA Federation board member Elyse Lackie.

Other members include federation volunteers Morris Perlis and Tom Lobel; Hillel at York president Daniel Ferman, Hasbara at York co-president Tyler Golden, and York student Miryam Speigel.

The commission is seeking submissions from community members who have experienced hostility at York and have ideas about improving the quality of Jewish life on campus.

In recent months, there have been a number of incidents in which Jewish students have been intimidated, including one on Feb. 11 when Jewish students were barricaded in the Hillel lounge by students yelling anti-Semitic and anti-Israel slurs. The Jewish students had to be escorted off campus by police.

Last week, Krisna Saravanamuttu, incoming president of the York Federation of Students, was fined, and both he and York student Jesse Zimmerman were ordered to undergo sensitivity training for having violated the York student code of conduct for their roles in the incident.

Groups keep pressure on York
Please see page 23

UJA Federation spokesperson and commission member Howard English said commission members have already had a meeting, during which they discussed their goals and how they will achieve their objectives.

"We obviously want to improve the quality of Jewish life at York, we want to help York ensure a safe environment for all students and we want to provide members of our community with an opportunity to have their say," English said.

"We see this as a unique way of involving the community in the process of creating change at York. We see this is as a really democratic process. We see this as an opportunity for the community to turn their concern into action."

The commission hopes to present recommendations to the York University Task Force on Student Life, Learning and Community by June 15. The task force – headed by Osgoode Hall Law School dean Patrick Monahan, York's incoming provost – was struck earlier this year after clashes between pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian students. Its mandate is to improve security and relations among students at York.

"We're doing this because we want York to maintain its global reputation as a centre of higher learning, and because we genuinely want to improve the atmosphere at York on behalf of Jewish students and all students," English added. "As long as there is a strong Jewish presence [at York], we want to make sure that the quality of life for Jewish students is better than it has been to date."

English said that the recommendations will outline ways that York can improve the safety and security of all students on campus.

"The recommendations will be very specific about what York can do to amend, perhaps, its codes of conduct, and to initiate regulatory steps that would prevent incidents that have taken place from taking place again."

He said that the commission is not intended to be an alternative to York's task force, but is meant to assist the task force by providing information that could help improve student life on campus.

"The community is concerned about the atmosphere facing Jewish students. We understand that, so rather than just complaining, we felt that we wanted to provide a unique opportunity to the community to do something about their concern."

Michael Benjamin

To me, it's the rows of plates displayed in the Chapel's foyer. For 87 years, we have commissioned a new plate to give the members of our Chevra Kadisha at the annual Zion Adar Dinner. 87 years... 87 plates... now imagine what a 2000 year old tradition looks like; a tradition we honour as a sacred trust.

Greater Toronto Area

Still fighting for Jerusalem

Last week, with great excitement and to coincide with Jerusalem Day, the Israel Antiquities Authority announced two significant archeological discoveries.

The first, a seal made of bone from the First Temple era, was found in the excavations in the walls around the national park in the City of David. The name inscribed on the seal was Sha'ul (Saul). The name is known to us from both the Bible (Genesis 36:37; 1 Samuel 9:2; 1 Chronicles 4:24 and 6:9) and from other Hebrew seals. It is missing a piece from its upper right side. (See the photo inset.)

From the editor's desk...

The second discovery was a jar handle, also from the First Temple period, bearing the Hebrew name Menachem. The piece was found in eastern Jerusalem during an excavation prior to the building of a girls' school in the area of Ras el-Amud.

The finds are interesting in their own scientific and archeological right. But of late, ever since Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat informed U.S. president Bill Clinton at Camp David in 2000 that a Jewish Temple never stood in Jerusalem, such archeological finds pack a distinct political significance as well.

The American president was stunned into a disbelieving silence. Perhaps his Palestinian guest was merely being provocative or playful, he thought.

But Arafat, outfitted always in form-fitting battle fatigues, was not teasing his host or being deliberately clownish. He was, rather, stating doctrinal Palestinian dogma: there is no evidence of the Jews' Temple ever having been in Jerusalem.

It remains official Palestinian doctrine. It is the core religious teaching about Jerusalem by Palestinian clerics.

Forty-two years ago on the 28th day of Iyar, during the Six Day War, east and west Jerusalem were reunited. Israelis fought a bloody battle for Jerusalem. Since then, the day has been celebrated as Yom Yerushalayim (Jerusalem Day).

Though these events happened in our lifetime, their history is already being ignored, or worse, distorted.

Why, indeed, was the city divided between east and west before June 1967? Why, indeed, do we have to remind the world of the facts of the historical record?

Prior to Israel's War of Independence in 1948, the city of Jerusalem was undivided. The Old City (east Jerusalem) and the New City (west Jerusalem) were part of one large municipality. By the end of the war's fighting, the Jordanian army controlled the Old City, the new Israeli army controlled the New City.

Not content, however, to have full control over the Old City, the Jordanians expelled every Jew from the Jewish Quarter, where they had lived, in many instances, for hundreds of years.

Not content, either, to have expelled every Jew from the Old City of Jerusalem, the Jordanians also destroyed every synagogue in the Old City.

Not content even with having destroyed every synagogue, the Jordanians also desecrated, despoiled and defaced many of the Jews' holy artifacts such as gravestones.

Rolls and rolls of barbed wire, concrete barriers and snipers' nests became the border separating east from west Jerusalem at the end of the war for Israel's Independence. That border remained in place for 19 years. But there was no obligation, morally, historically or legally, for the State of Israel to accept it as the international border. Indeed, no country other than Great Britain considered it to be a viable border. On the 28th day of Iyar, 42 years ago, the barbed wire was cut down, the concrete blocks were removed, and the snipers' nests were dismantled. The city was reunited.

Last week, in commemorating Yom Yerushalayim, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told the people of Israel that "united Jerusalem is the capital of Israel. Jerusalem has always been – and always will be – ours. It will never again be divided or cut in half. Jerusalem will remain only under Israel's sovereignty. In united Jerusalem, the freedom of worship and freedom of access for all three religions to the holy sites will be guaranteed, and it is the only way to guarantee that members of all faiths, minorities and denominations can continue living here safely."

It was the very same message that he had imparted to U.S. President Barack Obama the day before in Washington.

Apparently , however, the U.S. State Department was not pleased with the Israeli prime minister's message. This past Sunday, a State Department official said that "Jerusalem is a final status issue." According to the State Department, the future of the city must be determined through peace negotiations.

It is absurd that the existence of the Jewish Temple in Jerusalem is not considered a fact of ancient history.

It is absurd that the facts of even recent history in Jerusalem need to be constantly stated and restated.

It is perhaps most absurd, but least surprising and most painfully sad, that the desire to once again divide Jerusalem is still an option for so many.

It may be 42 years after the reunification of Jerusalem, or even some 3,000 after its embrace by King David as the capital of the Jewish state, but in truth, Israelis and Jews around the world are still fighting for Jerusalem today.

Ethiopian immigrant spearheads advocacy group

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Danny Admasu, the 34-year-old executive director of the Israel Association for Ethiopian Jewry (IAEJ), wants to raise awareness on the current situation of Ethiopian olim.

He was in Toronto in early May, shortly before the 18th anniversary of Operation Solomon – the May 1991 transport of more than 14,000 Ethiopian Jews to Israel in a 36-hour period – to fundraise as well.

The IAEJ, which is funded privately, has been hit by tough economic times. Its 10-person staff has been reduced to seven people, and those remaining have had their salaries cut 10 per cent, Admasu said.

Under former prime minister Ehud Olmert, the Israeli government put in place a five-year plan that addresses housing, welfare and employment issues that concern the Ethiopian community, Admasu said. "We want to make sure the [current] government follows through on its commitment."

Danny Admasu

Underemployment is a particular concern for the Ethiopian community, said Admasu, who made aliyah at age eight. "A lot of Ethiopian university graduates don't have employment that fits their skills… In Israel, you need a lot of connections. There's also discrimination, and [the issue of] having access to information."

Admasu said his organization is also "very worried about" housing. Ethiopians in Israel commonly live in poor, high-crime neighbourhoods that lack good schools and have little to offer in the way of afternoon activities, he added.

"We have to help the Ethiopian community, [and its young couples], get out of these neighbourhoods by helping with mortgages, so they can start their life without the same circle of poverty. They'll have job opportunities, and their children will grow up in a better society."

Admasu, who was orphaned in his teens and worked with youth at risk as a young adult, was also a counsellor at Camp Ramah Canada in 1998.

"As an organization, it's our duty to see what the problems in the community are, and to point the way for the government to deal with these problems," said Admasu.

On the other hand, he added, "we have to empower the community so that they have their rights, and know where to get information about their rights. We also have to be a voice for the community."

Language barriers, particularly for older immigrants, can make access to information difficult, he noted.

As well, non-Ethiopian immigrants to Israel for the most part are from western countries, Admasu pointed out. An immigrant who is a mechanical engineer will "talk the same language" as his Israeli counterpart.

But in Ethiopia, "the family lived in the village. It was a different life… They don't really understand the culture or what activities they should send their children to, what will be good for their future."

Even for the next generation, it's harder for Ethiopians to assimilate because of their colour. "Even if they're born Israeli, others will point to them and say they're from another place."

While things have improved to some extent for the Ethiopian community, there is still more to be done, Admasu believes.

One positive development in the last two years is the employment of at least 700 Ethiopians in government and public companies as the result of an equal opportunity employment law, Admasu said. "That means that every one of them meets non-Ethiopian Israelis," he noted.

The CJC at 90

It was God himself who called the Jewish people "stiff-necked." He was speaking to Moses, the paradigmatic Jewish leader and teacher for all time to come. It was a severe scolding, of course, regarding the behaviour of the recently liberated slaves, but also a warning to the octogenarian lawgiver that public service on behalf of the Jewish people was not an easy undertaking. As if Moses (and his brother, Aaron) didn't already know that by then.

But true to the moral weight that has always attached to the pre-eminent imperative of fighting for and ensuring the well-being of the wider community throughout the long millennia of Jewish history, public service on behalf of the Jewish people, indeed, has always been a compulsory undertaking.

Our ancient sages assiduously sought to encourage communal public service. "If someone occupies himself [or herself] with the needs of the community," they said, "it is as if he [or she] were studying Torah itself." In other words, there could be no higher purpose.

This week we celebrate 90 years of committed high purpose, of public service on behalf of the Jews of Canada, by the most widely recognized of this country's Jewish communal public servants: Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Over the past 90 years, the CJC's lay and professional leaders have been among Canada's most accomplished, talented, achieving and caring individuals dedicated to a mission that was and remains advocating on behalf of the well-being of the Jewish community and safeguarding the human rights of the oppressed and the needy throughout the world. (The page opposite provides a small catalogue of snapshots of that advocacy.)

Just as Canada and the community have changed over the past nine decades, so, too, has the CJC. It has had to evolve – and one can argue, is still evolving – to serve, as best it can, the needs of the Jewish and wider community of Canada. The instruments of advocacy are different today than they were in the past, as are the issues.

Today some 75 per cent of the Jews of Canada live in two metropolitan areas, Montreal and Toronto. Some 90 per cent of Canadian Jews live in five cities. Today, approximately half of the Jews on earth live in Israel. Today, very few Jewish communities on earth live in fear for their existential safety – with the notable exceptions of the Jews of Iran and perhaps France, and, ironically, the Jews of Israel.

Even as they encouraged it however, the sages also understood that public service on behalf of the community was difficult, demanding and so often, thankless. Thus, they established a special blessing for Jewish public servants that has been incorporated into the Sabbath service. Typically, however, in their wisdom, our sages prescribed the requisite behaviour at the same time as they described the blessing that such labour would evoke. "And all those who work for the needs of the community faithfully [i.e., in good faith, for no ulterior motive or inappropriate purpose), God will ensure their reward…"

To the men and women of the CJC who faithfully work on behalf of the needs of the community, we ask for and invoke God's blessing.

Rabbi Martin Lockshin is right when he expresses his surprise at the 25-year partnership between ArtScroll and modern Orthodox congregations ("Get ready for duelling prayerbooks," CJN Perspectives, May 7). However, rather than picking a bone with ArtScroll, he should be doing so with the modern Orthodox community for taking so long to produce their own version.

In the interim, Artscroll has served them well, and will continue to do so for many others. Lockshin claims that the "largest and most established Orthodox synagogues in Canada and the United States like to think of themselves as modern Orthodox." A quick look at Wikipedia (admittedly not a scientific survey) lists the largest six synagogues in the world of all denominations. Five of them are in fact Chassidic congregations and one is Syrian. None of them would "like to think of themselves as modern Orthodox." Furthermore, contrary to Rabbi Lockshin's claim that "perhaps in the most right-wing circles, [where] prayerbooks with any English may be dismissed with disdain," one can find ArtScroll English-Hebrew siddurim in every Orthodox synagogue, of all descriptions. For these congregations, and hundreds of others across the world, the ArtScroll English (not to mention French, Russian, Spanish) Siddur will continue to be a very appropriate match for years to come.

I am glad that Rabbi Lockshin has found a siddur to his liking. The KorenSacks siddur may very well may be the siddur of the future for modern Orthodox shuls, but don't discount ArtScroll and its users just yet.

Finds ArtScroll siddur helpful

What could have been an exciting article heralding a siddur that includes Rabbi Jonathan Sacks' insights has turned into a divisive "us against them" proposition, serving to undermine attempts at community unity. I welcome KorenSacks' attempt to better capture the eloquence of our traditional texts, as well as the inclusion of a wider group of Orthodox scholars as sources, although I personally respect the opposing position that fails to include an atheist viewpoint in an Orthodox prayerbook.

It is unfortunate that the author chooses to portray in a negative light the Zionist edition of the siddur published by ArtScroll in partnership with the Rabbinical Council of America. The author also implies that the ArtScroll community is less than sensitive to women. Many women, as well as many men, haredi and otherwise, derive much benefit from numerous ArtScroll publications. But to imply that Artscroll values are not sensitive to women can be quite insulting to many of those people the author is supposedly protecting.

The article serves to marginalize ArtScroll and helps to dissuade people from purchasing the ArtScroll siddur in the future and to search for a more meaningful Judaism in its pages, thereby hindering the growth of our entire community. The author also claims that Artscroll attempts to inspire to a "docile, passive faith." I personally find this offensive, as I have always found my faith to be an active, inclusive one, and I have often been helped along this path by ArtScroll.

Shavuot and the environment

Shavuot provides a wonderful opportunity to consider if we are properly applying Torah values.

Since the Torah teaches that we are to be shomrei adamah (guardians of the earth), shouldn't we do more in addressing the many current severe environmental threats? Since the Torah stresses that we should very diligently guard our health, shouldn't we consider the many negative health effects of animal-based diets? Since the Torah mandates the avoidance of tza'ar ba'alei chaim (causing unnecessary pain to animals), shouldn't there be far greater concern about the horrible treatment of animals (10 billion annually in the United States alone) on factory farms? Since the Torah mandates that we are to share with hungry people, shouldn't we address the fact that 70 per cent of the grain produced in the United States is being fed to farmed animals, while an estimated 20 million people die from malnutrition annually?

Let us make this Shavuot a time to begin truly applying Torah values in order to produce a more humane, healthy, environmentally sustainable, just and compassionate world.

NINE DECADES OF ADVOCACY

On Sunday, May 31, at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress will hold its 29th Plenary Assembly. The photos here are a short trip through 90 years of advocacy by the CJC since its founding in 1919. Clockwise from the top, delegates to the first CJC plenary March 16-19, 1919, in Montreal, pose for a picture; students from Montreal's Hebrew Academy High School demonstrate in Dorchester Square at a vigil for 13 imprisoned Iranian Jews, June 2, 2000; pictured before leaving port in Europe are the first group of war orphans to come to Canada under CJC's refugee youth project, which brought more than 1,000 young Holocaust survivors to Canada between 1947 and 1952; the cover of one of three Jewish War Heroes comics books featuring the stories of real Jewish heroes from Canada and other Allied nations, which CJC issued in 1944, to improve wartime morale; the cover of a relief package sent overseas to help needy Jews in the aftermath of World War II; then-prime minister Pierre Trudeau jokes with then CJC president Sol Kanee and CJC executive director Saul Hayes in 1970; as part of the National Committee for Soviet Jewry, women of the "Group of 35" march in front of Toronto's Massey Hall to show support for oppressed Soviet Jews in the 1970s; CJC president Keith Landy addresses a massive pro-Israel rally on Parliament Hill in Ottawa in 2001; due to the intervention of the CJC, some 450 Jewish refugees stranded in Iberia came to Canada in 1944 in the middle of World War II; current CJC co-presidents Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Sylvain Abitbol, along with CEO Bernie Farber, meet Prime Minister Stephen Harper in Ottawa in November 2008; and Samuel Bronfman is pictured assuming the presidency of CJC at the 1939 Plenary Assembly, a post he would hold until 1961.

Opinions

Killing fields of the Shoah

The Holocaust is primarily defined by the annihilation of millions of Jews in concentration camps across Europe. But while the inhumanity of what occurred in those mechanized extermination centres is well chronicled, another component of the genocide, which claimed the lives of an estimated 1.5 million or more, has been less well recognized.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

So although many will have heard about the two-day slaughter of some 33,000, mostly Jews, at Babi Yar, the stories of Jewish women being forced to swim across a river in the Ukrainian town of Berdichev until they downed, or children being thrown alive into pits containing the corpses of their parents in Telsiai, Lithuania, or Jews being locked into barns until they perished in Liozno, Belarus, have gone mostly unnoticed.

Such examples of barbarism, and countless other massacres (usually by shootings at close range), began after the Germans invaded the Soviet Union during the summer of 1941. Perpetrated by Einsatzgruppen (Nazi mobile killing units), together with local collaborators, these actions were the first phase of the "final solution to the Jewish question," which was to be more formally articulated at the infamous Wannsee Conference in January 1942.

Proof of what occurred in the killing fields was kept secret for decades. More recently, a lot of what has come to light has been through the efforts of a rather remarkable Roman Catholic priest named Patrick Desbois.

Father Desbois' voyage of discovery began fortuitously in 2002 after he visited the Ukrainian town of Rawa Ruska, where his grandfather had been imprisoned during the war. While there, he learned about not only the unmarked mass graves just outside that town, but also about countless others on the outskirts of towns and villages across Ukraine.

What followed speaks to a passion, humanity and selflessness that are inspiring. Working with a small team that includes a translator, a researcher, a mapping expert and a videographer, he set about interviewing townspeople who had once witnessed the slaughter, and within the first four years of his project, he had gathered more than 800 accounts of Nazi atrocities and identified some 600 gravesites.

In his book, aptly titled "The Holocaust by Bullets" (Palgrave Macmillan, 2008), he eloquently describes his research, wherever possible supporting his findings with forensic evidence and archival material.

But more than just focusing attention on so tragic a chapter in Jewish history, Father Desbois' work serves also as a call for more urgent action. As time runs out for the witnesses, the onerous task of identifying the many remaining gravesites and properly consecrating them according to Jewish tradition becomes that much more difficult.

Wanted: a more eclectic mix of western olim

I recently had a great time with my family and some friends at the 32nd annual Jacob's Ladder Music Festival, held at Kibbutz Ginosar, just north of Tiberias, on the shores of the Kinneret. It's advertised as "a unique musical and social event for lovers of all aspects of folk music, from bluegrass to world music, from Irish jigs to country rock, from blues to renaissance." It certainly was.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

It was our first time at the celebration. We camped on the kibbutz lawns along with hundreds of other people. Those preferring more creature comforts stayed at the kibbutz hotel.

During the three-day music fest, several venues ran concurrently, each with its own brand and band. Some acts ran into the wee hours of the night. Impromptu jam sessions took place in every available corner in the guesthouse lobby, at every conceivable hour. Kids ran about freely and safely, enjoying the music, playing at a circus corner, participating in handicraft workshops, or listening intently to storytellers.

Adults could enjoy massages, music workshops, hone their skills at square dancing or the Irish jig, or shop at the many booths set up around the premises. Many enjoyed a dip in the cool, albeit depleted, waters of the Kinneret or at the pool. There was also an uplifting musical Kabbalat Shabbat.

The headliners were the Foggy Hogtown Boys, a group of wonderful bluegrass musicians from Toronto. They gave several great performances, including the festival's closing concert, and seemed to enjoy the spirit, noting the significance for them of performing on the shores of the Sea of Galilee. They played a great piece called Straighten the Curves, which, as they remarked, well described their taxi ride from the airport to Ginosar.

The audience was extraordinary: people from all over the country in a blend of families with kids, teenagers and young adults, and pensioners my parents' age, all enjoying the music and soul of the happening.

Ha'aretz has called Jacob's Ladder Israel's English-speaking mimouna. The lingua franca of the festival is certainly English, although I'm told it was much more so in the past, with a large number of sabras joining the merrymaking, many of them children of anglophone olim.

While there were some Orthodox people in attendance, what struck me most was the number and array of non-Orthodox anglos gathered at this event. This facet of the weekend gave me food for thought on the drive home to Jerusalem, with my exhausted wife and kids all asleep in the car.

Western olim are considered quality immigrants, because they're relatively low maintenance – college educated and financially sound. As a result, MKs have banded together to form a parliamentary lobby aimed at increasing western aliyah.

According to the Central Bureau of Information, roughly 100,000 North American immigrants were living in Israel at the end of 2007. An additional 50,000 people originated from other English-speaking countries, such as Britain, South Africa, Australia and New Zealand. Ministry of Immigrant Absorption statistics show that since 2000, almost 30,000 anglos have made aliyah, including 2,700 from Canada.

Nefesh B'Nefesh, a wonderful organization whose goal is encouraging aliyah from North America and Britain by removing or minimizing the financial, professional, logistical and social obstacles that potential olim face, and by helping ensure their successful absorption in Israel, has – remarkably – brought 18,000 immigrants to the country since 2002.

The pervading impression is that the majority of this decade's anglo aliyah is Orthodox. I couldn't find figures to support or contradict that feeling, but just looking at pictures of Nefesh B'Nefesh flight arrivals lends credence to this idea.

Orthodox aliyah is terrific, but we need more eclectic immigration from the West, people of spirit to join the youth movement pioneers of the 1940s and '50s, as well as the euphoric post-Six-Day-War settlers and the idealistic souls who came to shore up the ranks after the Yom Kippur War.

Despite the adversities and challenges, there's still plenty of place for such people in Israel – hard-working, productive people who consider it OK to enjoy a weekend of high-spirited frivolity among like-minded folks who, like them, feel good about living and bringing up their kids here.

Help us keep the music playing.

Narrative wars and 'the days'

The seven weeks between Passover and Shavuot are known in Israel as "the days" – a reference to days of the Omer and also the special days marking the catastrophes and triumphs of modern Jewish history. In this period, we move from Holocaust Remembrance Day, to Memorial Day for those killed in the wars against Israel, followed immediately by Independence Day, and ending with Jerusalem Day, marking the miraculous return to the Holy City in the 1967 war. This period is an emotional roller coaster marking the events of the past 70 years.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The four "days" are also a form of resistance in the narrative wars that are being waged in support of the myths in which Israelis are portrayed as evil occupiers and neo-colonialists, oppressing innocent Arab victims.

Holocaust denial is a central part of this framework. Throughout the Muslim world, the culture of conspiracy, combined with anti-Israel and anti-Semitic sentiment, have fostered these myths. The president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, wrote his doctoral thesis in Moscow on "The Secret Connection between the Nazis and the Leaders of the Zionist Movement," which included a large measure of Holocaust revisionism. It was published in Amman in 1984.

More recently, in a text prepared for the United Nation's Durban Review Conference in April, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad referred to the "ambiguous and dubious" events of the Holocaust. UN officials persuaded him to change the language, and instead he denounced the "pretext of suffering" used by Israel, but the difference was of little consequence.

Holocaust denial and revisionism are also used to erase the reality behind the establishment of Israel. Since Arab leaders rejected the 1947 UN Partition Plan ("two states for two peoples"), they have continued to press for its reversal. In their fictitious version, which is now widely accepted in Europe, as well as on university campuses in North America (York University, in particular), and among many journalists, the terror campaigns and wars have been edited out. The 22,000 Israeli soldiers and civilians who gave their lives (and the countless more who were injured) to preserve Jewish rights are being recast as invaders and villains.

This narrative is enhanced by the image of the Palestinians as innocent victims – an indigenous people supplanted by colonialists ("the Jews") supported by capitalist European powers. Israel's acts of self-defence have been twisted into "war crimes" and "collective punishment" by supposedly moral organizations such as Human Rights Watch, Amnesty International and Oxfam. In Israel, with massive support from European governments and wealthy, misguided Diaspora Jews, an industry of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) gives legitimacy to this mythology.

The celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut – Independence Day – is a reassertion of the historic reality, in opposition to campaigns that deny the Jewish people the right to sovereign equality. With more than 50 officially Islamic states (including, of course, Ahmadinejad's Iran), and more than 30 Christian countries, many of which include an official church, the labelling of the world's single Jewish state as "racist" or "discriminatory" reflects discrimination and double standards. Such rhetoric is in itself racist and an expression of the new anti-Semitism, which attacks the Jewish nation as a collective.

And finally, Jerusalem Day is a reminder that the Holy City has been central to the Jewish people for 3,000 years. The 1967 war ended generations of foreign occupation, and rebuilding began. Far from "Judaizing" Jerusalem, which is another myth in the Palestinian/Muslim/NGO assault, Israel has ensured full Muslim and Christian access to their religious sites. This stands in sharp contrast to the systematic desecration of synagogues and cemeteries, particularly during the Jordanian/Palestinian occupation following the 1948 war, and the complicity of the "international community" in the violation of the armistice agreements guaranteeing free access to sacred sites in Jerusalem.

By reminding us and the world of the realities of modern Jewish history, the "days" serve as an antidote to the revisionism designed to replace these events with demonizing mythologies.

As in the Passover seder and the retelling of the Exodus, we need to teach our children about these recent realities, or we will lose our history.

The Kirshner File

What comes after Netanyahu-Obama meeting?

Seasoned observers of Israel's alliance with the United States regarded Benjamin Netanyahu's meeting with Barack Obama at the White House on May 18 as a pivotal moment. Speculation had abounded that Israel's new prime minister, given his reluctance to endorse a two-state solution to resolve Israel's conflict with the Palestinians, would clash with the newly elected president of the United States and thereby damage Israel's single most important bilateral relationship.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

On the eve of Netanyahu's much-anticipated visit, Washington made it abundantly clear that a two-state solution – which previous Israeli governments have endorsed and worked for in various degrees of seriousness – was central to Obama's Middle East policy. Obama and his vice-president, Joe Biden, promoted the internationally embraced concept, while urging Israel to stop building or expanding settlements in the West Bank, dismantle unauthorized outposts and allow Palestinians freedom of movement.

As if to underline the point, George Mitchell, Obama's Mideast envoy, declared that a two-state solution was in Israel's national interest and really the only way to defuse its long-running dispute with the Palestinians. "The U.S. is committed to the establishment of a sovereign, independent Palestinian state, where the aspirations of the Palestinian people to control their own destiny are realized," said Mitchell during one of his three trips to the region in recent months.

With Netanyahu's appearance in Washington drawing ever closer, the United States applied none-too-subtle pressure on Israel. Susan Rice, the American ambassador to the United Nations, voted for a Security Council resolution calling for "urgent action" to achieve a two-state settlement. In addition, Rice reminded Israel that the Obama administration was not keen on a "lengthy, drawn-out process" to reach that objective. Meanwhile, Jim Jones, Obama's national security adviser, pointedly observed that there was "an expectation" in world capitals that peace in the Middle East should be vigorously pursued.

Yet as it clearly enunciated the need for Palestinian statehood, the United States described its bonds with Israel as "unshakable as ever," expressed support for Israel's security, opposed calls for the right of Palestinian refugees to return to their former homes in what is now Israel, condemned Palestinian violence, pledged to boycott Hamas unless it recognizes Israel and renounces terrorism, and promised to maintain Israel's qualitative military edge over the Arabs. And in further deference to Israel, Washington boycotted the second UN anti-racism conference, held last month in Geneva. At the same time, the Obama administration voiced its commitment to the 2003 "road map" peace plan, which remains a dead letter to this day.

The Islamic fundamentalist regime in Tehran is a clear and present problem – for Israel, the United States and moderate Arab governments – because of its ardent desire to acquire a nuclear weapons arsenal and to expand its influence in the Middle East, particularly in the Gaza Strip and Lebanon.

Obama and his advisers believe that a resolution of Palestinian grievances, resulting in full-fledged statehood, will better enable the United States to engage Iran in talks designed to halt its nuclear program once and for all and blunt its clout in the region.

By contrast, Netanyahu is of the view that if the Iranian thorn is removed by diplomacy, economic sanctions or military means, negotiations with the Palestinians will then have a better chance of succeeding.

Since becoming prime minister again, Netanyahu has called for a "fresh approach" to peace with the Palestinians, suggesting that talks should be resumed without delay or preconditions, and that they should be pursued on political, security and economic tracks. And while Netanyahu claims that Israel does not wish to govern the Palestinians, he has adamantly refused to explicitly support a two-state solution, sowing suspicion that his real agenda is to scuttle the peace process and leave Israel with a hefty slice of the West Bank in its hands.

Netanyahu's foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman, has fanned such fears. He has stated that Israel is not bound by the Annapolis process, which Netanyahu's predecessor, Ehud Olmert, embraced and attempted to flesh out in talks with the Palestinians. And he has derisively compared Israeli-Palestinian negotiations to a cottage industry.

Due to all these factors, Israeli and American commentators feared that a confrontation with the United States was in the offing and that Netanyahu and Obama would not reach an understanding befitting allies.

Recalling Netanyahu's sometimes rocky relations with Bill Clinton, a former U.S. president, Aaron David Miller, a senior official in Clinton's Mideast peace team, noted that the United States was deeply frustrated with Netanyahu's "erratic and often obstinate policies, in particular on settlements."

But as he prepared for his momentous encounter with Obama, Netanyahu played down any notion of friction with the United States, noting that Washington and Jerusalem share mutual interests and values, and that ties between them are strong.

In fact, a confrontation did not occur, with both Netanyahu and Lieberman portraying the meeting in rather positive tones. According to Netanyahu, Israel and the United States reached understandings on two vital issues: Israel would soon launch talks with the Palestinians, and Iran's nuclear program had to be stopped.

At their meeting, which lasted an hour longer than planned, Netanyahu reiterated his interest in resuming talks with the Palestinians immediately, but only if they recognize Israel as a Jewish state. In this vein, he said that Israel wants "to live in peace" with the Palestinians, yet he declined to support a two-state solution. After the meeting, one of Netanyahu's advisers said that the focus on a two-state solution was "childish and stupid." This will not be taken lightly in Washington.

For his part, Obama pressed Netanyahu to freeze the construction of settlements in the West Bank. As he put it, "Settlements have to be stopped in order for us to move forward." Prior to Netanyahu's departure for the United States, Israel issued tenders to expand Maskiot, a settlement in the West Bank. But in the wake of Netanyahu's meeting with Obama, Defence Minister Ehud Barak announced that unauthorized outposts, as opposed to regular settlements, would be removed, by force if necessary. And in a further nod to Obama, Israel evacuated Moaz, one of the many unauthorized outposts that Israel has promised, but failed, to dismantle.

As for Iran, Obama said that he had no intention of conducting talks with Iran indefinitely on ending its program of uranium enrichment. Washington is truly concerned by Iran's nuclear program. Last week, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton described it as an "extraordinary threat." Israel is probably satisfied with U.S. policy on this score, having said that U.S.-Iranian discussions should be subjected to a strict deadline. Before flying to Washington, Netanyahu promised the Obama administration that Israel would not attack Iran without notifying the United States.

The Netanyahu-Obama meeting notwithstanding, it is still far from clear whether Israel and the United States are heading for a bruising test of wills. The situation will be much clearer in June, when Obama is scheduled to deliver a major speech in Cairo on the Middle East. Until then, Netanyahu will have to hold his breath.

Time runs out on proposed boycott resolution

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A proposal to boycott Israeli academic institutions never came to a vote at a meeting of CUPE local 3903 last week.

As time ran out, the local, representing teachers and staff at York University, shelved the vote until the next meeting on June 25.

Longtime union member and ethnomusicologist Judith Cohen attended the meeting to try to forestall adoption of the resolution. Cohen has become involved in meetings only in the last year or so as she witnessed the labour organization's increasingly strident criticism of Israel.

Though the boycott vote never got to the members, Cohen said a comment from the floor gave a pretty good indication where the activists who attended the meeting stand. Following presentations in support of the motion by two critics of Israel, the chair was asked why no one presented the other side of the debate.

"'There is no other side,'" someone in the audience said.

No one on the executive running the meeting challenged that view or offered an explanation why a rebuttal wasn't offered, Cohen said.

It shows how ingrained is the union leadership's anti-Israel position, she said in an interview.

The resolution discussed last week was passed by the Ontario University Workers Co-ordinating Committee (OUWCC) in February. The OUWCC is a constituent part of the Canadian Union of Public Employees. Three years ago, CUPE's Ontario wing, which represents some 200,000 public sector workers, passed Resolution 50 supporting "boycott, divestment and sanctions to end Israel's apartheid practices."

The university workers' resolution would apply the resolution to the academic realm. However, CUPE locals at the University of Toronto and McMaster have refused to endorse the OUWCC resolution, Cohen said.

Whether York workers pass the resolution at the local's next meeting is still up in the air, but the music professor and a few like-minded academics have begun to challenge the orthodoxy of the leadership's views on Israel.

About a month ago, she and a few others launched an online petition that explicitly opposed the boycott of Israeli academic institutions.

The petition states that the OUWCC motion "is one-sided and unethical. Moving ahead with this proposal represents a violation of basic academic freedom."

When she asked the local's executive to include notice of the petition in its newsletter, she was turned down. Eventually she convinced the local's executive to include it in its newsletter, but only after a rider was attached saying the executive didn't agree with it.

The executive later reversed its position and instructed the locals' communications director not to run it, but that direction was ignored and the petition was publicized. So far, about 85 CUPE members have signed on.

Last week, she and about 10 others attended the meeting with the intention of raising objections to the resolution. She's critical of the union leadership's one-sided position and its unwillingness to take a more balanced approach, such as adopting the McMaster Peace Initiative, an administration-led effort at McMaster University that calls for "respectful, meaningful discourse" to "advance diverse viewpoints in the spirit of inclusiveness and academic integrity."

One day after the union meeting, York University president Mamdouh Shoukri released a statement saying, "Universities at their core are free institutions that must be open to the widest range of ideas, argument and debates. Thus the concept of an academic boycott, which would prescribe a form of blacklist, is antithetical to the very purpose of a university. It would undermine the freedom of individual scholars to make their own academic choices and would suggest that the university 'owns' its academics or their opinions."

Law school was detour for Grade 5 teacher

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Kevin Knopman has a law degree and an honours bachelor of arts in political science. As a 22-year-old undergraduate university student, he ran for mayor of Toronto.

So it's not a big surprise that the Associated Hebrew Schools teacher enjoys helping to supervise the student council at the school's Kamin branch in Thornhill, where he teaches gym and Grade 5 general studies.

"It's fun," he said of his work with the council.

Knopman realized as a student at Osgoode Hall Law School that law wasn't what he wanted to do as a career.

In fact, his law studies were punctuated by a leave of absence after first year to earn his bachelor of education degree at the University of Toronto's Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE).

A longtime staff member of Centre Camp who has always enjoyed working with kids, Knopman now supervises the senior campers' division at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre day camp during the summer. He has also taught supplementary school, run after-school programs, and co-ordinated a youth volunteer program at the BJCC.

Knopman, who will turn 31 at the end of next week, began his career in education as a supply teacher, working for both Associated and the York Region District School Board, before he joined the staff at the Jewish day school.

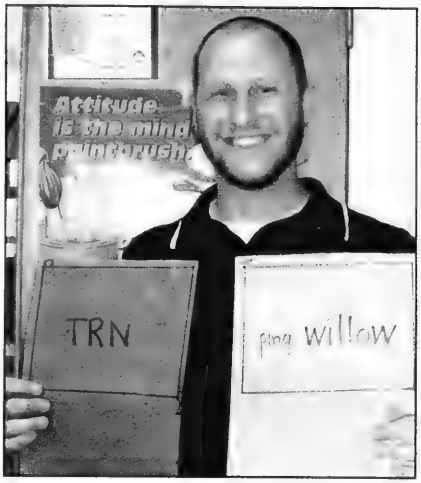
An alumnus of Associated himself, Knopman – now married and the father of an 11-month-old daughter – joined its staff four years ago and found he was comfortable being back there.

And he gets along well with his students, he said, recalling that he did well academically as a student, but "probably wasn't the best" behaviour-wise.

Knopman, who also co-coaches the school's softball team, has continued and expanded at least one routine that was started by the teacher whose class he took over.

Every morning, Knopman puts a "Wacky Word" brainteaser on the board for students to decipher.

The puzzles "make them think outside the box," he said. "It's fun, and it's also a way of managing the class. It keeps them in their seats, thinking."



Kevin Knopman displays two examples of the "Wacky Words" he uses to challenge his Grade 5 students. The one on the right (wee-ping willow) is tougher than the one on the left (no-"u" turn, or "no u-turn").

Knopman also enjoys making use of the SmartBoard at the front of his class, which allows him to use the Internet as a teaching tool.

Keeping up with new technology is part of "staying fresh" as a teacher, he said.

"As new technology comes out, you have to keep on top of what's new and what's cool and what's interesting, and what affects them. Something I read to kids four years ago might not ring a bell with kids today, and something I would have liked 20 or 30 years ago isn't something that would interest them now. You have to keep pace, keep current, and keep relevant."

A lesson from the teacher: "I think the most important part of my job as a teacher is to ensure that I give my students something to take home to think about besides homework."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Taste real blintzes on Shavuot

Think about any Jewish holiday and you will recall some significant Jewish symbol. Symbols are a major part of every Jewish holiday celebration: the shofar on Rosh Hashanah; fasting on Yom Kippur; a sukkah, etrog and lulav on Sukkot, and matzah and all the seder trappings on Pesach. Even the post-biblical holidays of Chanukah and Purim have unique symbols and practices, with each one reflecting the story and special message of the occasion.

Rabbinic Reflections

But what about our upcoming festival of Shavuot? What mitzvah or practice depicts the very essence of Shavuot – the time of our receiving the Torah? The tradition of staying up all night and studying Torah is laudable, but not necessarily unique to Shavuot night. Many people study Torah long into the night on many nights throughout the year. Decorating our homes or shuls with greenery that's symbolic of Mount Sinai is a practice most people are totally unaware of.

There doesn't appear to be anything on Shavuot equal to the shofar or matzah – or is there? We eat dairy foods, notably blintzes and/or cheesecake. That's Shavuot – the essence of the time of the receiving of the Torah. It seems ludicrous and highly non-spiritual, but let's give it some serious consideration: Torah and a blintz and lessons from Sinai.

Allow me to give this blintz a face. Let's use Chaim as the face. He loved blintzes. He and his wife were very poor, but Chaim was rich with dreams. One day, he was walking down the street when he smelled the fresh aroma of something wonderful. He followed his nose and there on the ledge of a window was a tray of amazing blintzes. He was tempted, but he was a righteous man and dared not touch. The woman then reached for the tray and Chaim seized the moment to ask for the recipe. She obliged by listing the necessary ingredients: fine flour, eggs, oil and, of course, fresh cheese.

Chaim ran home and announced that this Shavuot there would be blintzes, because he had the recipe. He could hardly wait for Shavuot and spoke about the blintzes every day for a month.

On Erev Shavuot, he nudged his wife all day as to when she was going to start making them. To make it easier, he volunteered to help. He would read out the instructions and she would just follow through. First, he said: "Pour in the fine flour." "But, we have no flour, fine or otherwise," replied his wife. "So use whatever you have and then blend in the eggs and the oil." Replied his wife: "But we have no eggs nor oil."

A bit anxious, Chaim replied: "Use whatever you can, then stir it and fill it up with cheese and bake them. It's almost yom tov."

She really did try her best. Instead of flour, she used some stale bread crumbs. Instead of eggs and oil, she used water and some leftover tea essence. And having no cheese, fresh or otherwise, she just left out that part.

Chaim sat in the other room salivating just thinking about his blintzes to be. He heard the bustle in the kitchen and finally smelled the aroma. They were ready, and after Kiddush, so was Chaim.

His wife brought these terrible-looking, hollow, empty things to the table, and Chaim took the first bite. They tasted worse than they looked, which was frightful enough.

In disbelief, Chaim turned to his wife and said: "I just don't understand what people see in blintzes. They're just not what they're cracked up to be."

To appreciate the full extent of the "time of the receiving of the Torah," and thus the values of the Torah itself, we need all the ingredients. When and if we must replace or find substitutes for some of the core ingredients, it's hard to find reason to celebrate. It's just not the real thing.

While scholarship and knowledge are crucial, it's the resulting value system and lifestyle flowing from Torah that Shavuot celebrates. The ingredients for a meaningful Matan Torah, a celebration of Torah on Shavuot, requires mutual respect, honesty, integrity and tolerance in our ongoing daily lives – of not only knowing and performing mitzvot, but applying the values of those mitzvot in other aspects of our lives.

Recalling that the most significant ingredient for the Sinai experience was close to three million people feeling and acting as one, can we possibly celebrate Shavuot without that sense of unity?

There is nothing like a real authentic "blintz" on Shavuot, or anytime. You just need all the original ingredients, still available in the form of mitzvot and ma'assim tovim.

Who wrote the Torah? Discuss

Although in the course of their Jewish education, students can potentially be exposed to a variety of topics, schools and teachers often shy away from full-blown examinations of who wrote the Torah – God, human beings or both?– and what the alternate views might be. Some of this hesitation is based in an ideological desire not to lead students into questions that are not in accord with a particular school's Jewish worldview. But part of the reticence is pragmatic: staff may not be trained to explore the wide diversity of views regarding the core issue of revelation and authorship of the text.

But in the interests of accuracy and even tolerance, it's sometimes necessary to at least inform students – obviously at an age-appropriate juncture – that there are different perspectives on what occurred at Sinai and afterward, the better to disabuse them of the notion that "everyone thinks like me" or, if they don't, that the other person's opinion is completely without basis.

Even within modern Judaism, various divergent positions can be outlined regarding this debate. To that end, the Conservative thinker Rabbi Elliot Dorff has noted at least five distinct points of view.

The most literal interpretation is that God gave the Torah, both the oral and written, all at once to Moshe at Sinai, and what we have are the exact words of God without any change. Once removed from this is what Rabbi Dorff terms "Conservative I," or the notion of "continuous revelation," which posits that God dictated His will at Sinai, but it was written down by a number of human beings (thus we have multiple traditions).

"Conservative II," which Rabbi Dorff ascribes to Rabbi Robert Gordis and famed philosopher Emil Fackenheim, argues that humans wrote the Torah, guided by divine inspiration.

"Conservative III," characterized by the outlooks of Rabbi Louis Jacobs and Rabbi Dorff himself, maintains that the Torah is the human record of the encounter between God and the nation of Israel at Sinai. An offshoot of this is nicely encapsulated in the Reform movement's 1937 statement of guiding principles: "Progressive revelation: The Torah is God's will written by human beings. As time goes on, we get to understand his will better and better."

The Reconstructionist view, typified by its founder, Rabbi Mordechai Kaplan, would totally remove any trace of divinity from the final product. Human beings wrote the Torah. Period.

There are a number of other shadings in this debate, but any attempt to teach these positions should be organized around meaningful pedagogical principles. What is the teacher trying to achieve by introducing this material? Academic rigour? A wish to counter perceived student biases?

Responsible educational practice would dictate that students should be trained slowly to absorb ideas that they may not have been exposed to previously, and that they be shown how one's understanding of Torah authorship may have lasting implications for all of one's other Jewish attitudes and practices. To cite one example, it makes quite a difference if you believe Israel was promised to you by God in the divinely created Bible, or if you think that such a claim is just a human invention.

As in all other matters of education, clarity is the first, but not the final, goal.

The educated person

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

Once again, we have reached the time of university graduations and commencement speeches. Beyond the ritual of cap and gown and old-grad sentimentality lurks a paramount question: apart from the accumulation of facts and information, what perceptions and values have students received as they enter a complex and uncertain future?

1. Is there intellectual curiosity?

Truth often disturbs what makes us most comfortable. The tracking down of ideas involves greater risk than pouring facts into a receptacle called the brain. In the words of Lincoln Steffens, "It is dangerous to think – always." But the educated must take the risk."

Our age demands open-mindedness, unrelenting doubt, ceaseless probing of life's problems at every stage, with enough independence and flexibility to confront emerging and unprecedented dilemmas.

There must be a passion for learning that is satisfied only by lifelong analysis and inquiry. Curious minds are able to surmount any kind of inadequate training.

2. Is there concern for the social ills of society?

Contemporary difficulties are explosive, increasingly numerous and perilously urgent.

Some examples? Racial and ethnic and religious prejudice, which sabotage the struggle for peace and undermine the security and moral health of the world; political chauvinism, which in one country after another prefers unrest and disunity to mature compromise; emotional frustrations that often lead to scapegoatism and group hostility; hatred for an "enemy" nation, so violent that some people are more eager to see that enemy expunged than to keep their own children alive.

3. Is there an appreciation for moral and esthetic values?

Where do we get our persistence to overcome setbacks and disappointments? Whence comes the impulse to aid our fellow men instead of striding over them in the struggle for personal success? Where is the wellspring for the voluntary offering of service to the community, to our neighbour?

The answer lies in non-material values that must be acquired along with knowledge in the educational process. Education's dual objectives must remain clear: education for living as well as education for making a living.

4. Is there proper humility?

An educated person is one whose mind is always watching itself. Shakespeare indicated, "Modest doubt is called the beacon of the wise." Bertrand Russell pointed out that the knowledge required of a scientist before he can do research in one technical area may expand to such proportions as to consume all the best years of his life.

Why then transmit simplistic explanations for the complex problems of society or for the supreme riddles of the universe? Changes in our age are so rapid that political and scientific revolutions occur within the span of a single lifetime. Will Durant observed, "Sixty years ago I knew everything; now I know nothing. Education is a progressive discovery of our own ignorance."

5. Is there a critical method of evaluation?

It is obvious that we live in an age of an information explosion. But we are also in the middle of a misinformation explosion. With the proliferation of mass communications, we are surrounded by hawkers, pitch-men, hard and soft sells, persuaders hidden and overt. Bombarded daily with millions of words by print and electronic media, we need some kind of critical apparatus to decide whom and what to believe, and to what degree.

One of humankind's most profitable resources for progress and for peace is in the universities of the free world. To realize their potential, they must mould men and women of intellect and spirit. What a tremendous challenge it is to instil the five ideas indicated above into their hearts and minds.

Shavuot and the Seven Species

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Shavuot is almost here and so are blintzes and cheesecakes. Although it's customary to eat dairy foods on Shavuot, you may want to try a different way to mark the holiday's agricultural roots. Shavuot was the time when farmers would bring the first harvest of seven special grains and fruits to the Temple in Jerusalem. Nowadays, we have no Temple, but you can still enjoy dishes made from the Seven Species: wheat and barley, grapes and figs, pomegranates, olives and honey.

Wheat has always been considered fundamental to Jewish life. "If there is no flour, there is no Torah; if there is no Torah, there is no flour." (Pirke Avot 3:21) In Foods of the Bible, Phyllis Glazer presents an overview of how our ancestors would mill grains and explains what kinds of breads, cakes and other dishes would be prepared. She also shares recipes for unleavened flatbread, wild wheat salad and earthy unyeasted bread. [tinyurl.com/spec01]

Although barley may not have the profile of wheat, it does have a very strong connection to Shavuot. In the Book of Ruth (traditionally read on Shavuot), Boaz first fancied Ruth working in the field under the hot sun and gives her a gift of "six measures of barley." There are numerous references to grapes and wine in the Torah, from Noah's indiscretions after the Flood to the huge grape cluster that the spies brought back after they toured Canaan. "The 'olive' in us is that part of ourselves that thrives on struggle, that revels in it, that would no more escape it than escape life itself. 'Just like an olive,' say our sages, 'which yields its oil only when pressed,' so, too, do we yield what is best in us only when pressed between the millstones of life and the counter forces of a divided self." Community walks for Israel

An estimated 12,000 people, including politicians representing Canada's three major parties, took part in UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's annual Walk with Israel on Sunday. The event raised about $400,000 to help integrate Ethiopian Israelis in Bat Yam and to fund educational and social welfare projects for Ethiopians in the Bat Yam and Eilat/Eilot areas. Seen here, clockwise from top left, volunteers hand out prizes to participants; two girls share a cookie at decorating booth; Toronto Argonauts cheerleaders join in the fun; youngster enjoys the camel rides at the Carnival; Jewish Family and Child Services workers at the walk.

Political system is Israel's Achilles heel, prof says

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

Things are looking up for the State of Israel, but its political system is the one key area that could use improvement, a leading Israeli political scientist says.

Speaking at Holy Blossom Temple May 11, Prof. Gabriel Ben-Dor sounded a mostly positive note about Israel's future.

Gabriel Ben-Dor

"The State of Israel today is in surprisingly good shape," he said. "Things are going very well, indeed, despite what you may have heard to the contrary. There is every reason to be optimistic."

Ben-Dor, who works at the Strategic Dialogue Center at Netanya College in Israel, cited a study of 2,000 people in which the overwhelming majority were very optimistic about Israel's future and their future in Israel. The study, conducted by the Tami Steinmetz Center for Peace Research, with the results published on Israel's 61st birthday, found that 80 per cent of respondents described their status as "good" or "very good."

Israel's economy is also doing well, especially compared to other countries, Ben-Dor said, mentioning the low unemployment rate (6.1 per cent in 2008) and the strength of the shekel.

Three or four years ago, he said, his son was searching for an apartment in Tel Aviv and everything was priced in U.S. dollars. Today everything is in shekels because while the U.S. dollar keeps fluctuating, the shekel has remained relatively stable.

On another positive note, the Jewish population in Israel is increasing consistently, Ben-Dor said. Of 154,000 babies born in Israel in 2008, 70 per cent were Jewish. The Jewish population in Israel increases by about 120,000 people each year. With 5.6 million Jews currently living in Israel, he expects the Jewish population to reach six million in just a few years.

In spite of all the good news about Israel, Ben-Dor said there is one major area of concern: its political system.

Comparing Israel to a sports team with great players but poor management, he said the current system is no longer working, and it hasn't been for some time.

"Things are changing in Israel in just about every respect, other than the political system," he said. "The system makes the country almost ungovernable."

With the average length of an Israeli government being 22 months, Ben-Dor said, by the time one becomes established and is working on fixing problems, its time in office ends and nothing gets accomplished.

Many major public affairs decisions are made by the courts, legal advisers and the state comptroller, none of whom are elected by the Israeli public.

Another major concern is that most Israelis see politics as a disgraceful profession, Ben-Dor said.

"The best people in Israeli society refuse to enter political life, depriving the state of high-quality politicians."

The result is that recycled people end up running, such as Benjamin Netanyahu, now serving as prime minister for the second time.

Ben-Dor made many suggestions for how the political system can be improved, including taking cues from Germany. In Germany, the minimum percentage of the national vote required to get a seat in parliament is five per cent. In Israel, it's two per cent. Increasing the percentage of the required vote would mean fewer political parties in the Knesset, he said.

Other reforms that Ben-Dor believes would improve the Israeli political system include making it difficult to overthrow a government, decreasing the frequency of elections and the number of parties, and giving more power to elected MKs.

He also supports having no more than five political parties: one in the centre, one on the left, one on the right, one for Arabs and one for religious Jews.

Currently, none of the five leading parties have even 30 seats in the Knesset.

Holding elections every four years would also help to create a more stable government, he said.

"The electoral system in Israel might have been OK 50 years ago, but it is not OK today," he added.

"When electoral systems no longer serve their purpose, you should not bow down to them – you should change them."

Memoir tells story behind global hotel chain

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A vignette in Isadore Sharp's new book hints at the state of mind that allowed the Toronto-born entrepreneur to create a world-class chain of hotels.

Back in the 1970s, when the Four Seasons was still a relatively small organization, Sharp told his senior managers and executives that he wanted to improve the way the hotel serves its customers. Service, he believed, was the key to burnishing the chain's reputation and ensuring it success.

So for lessons in service, he instructed his senior staff "to come with me to McDonald's and see how they train people for service."

That's McDonald's, as in Big Macs and Happy Meals.

Naturally, his employees were skeptical and taken aback. They sold filet mignon, not burgers, they said, but Sharp prevailed.

Thinking out of the box came naturally for Sharp, who didn't attend business school and got into the hotel business inadvertently as part of a real estate play. A builder by trade, his first hotel was erected on Jarvis Street in the early 1960s. He slowly got into the business of being an innkeeper, all the while continuing in the building trade.

Today, of course, Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts is an international chain synonymous with quality and luxury. Sharp tells his story in Four Seasons: The Story of a Business Philosophy (Penguin).

Isadore Sharp

At the company's Leslie Street headquarters, not far from the former site of Inn on the Park, one of Sharp's early creations, a wall is dedicated to expounding the philosophy of a firm that now includes 78 hotels in 32 countries and 40 properties under development.

Quality, service, culture and brand are the four cornerstones of that corporate philosophy, Sharp explained in an interview with The CJN. They were developed and tested over a 25-year period.

"You get an idea and then see if you can make it work. It's execution that becomes the reason you succeed or not."

Early on, he realized that giving customers what they needed and valued was the key to success. That fundamental value hasn't changed, he said.

But that doesn't make the hotel's operations static. As expectations develop, the hotel must adapt. That could mean providing services today that were inconceivable yesterday, he explained. At one time, no one expected to find an exercise facility in a hotel. Now, it's customary in almost all chains. The same goes for spas and other innovations, such as Internet access and flatscreen TVs.

As business has gone global, executives who travel the world expect to use their rooms as an office and meeting place. Satisfying those needs is necessary for a hotel to succeed, and "if the service is useful to you, it becomes the standard," he said.

Sharp's memoir describes his evolution from a builder, working with his dad, a Polish immigrant, to a hotelier with interests around the world. Along the way, he adapted the golden rule – do unto others as you would wish them to do to you – as the credo of his company.

With roots in the construction industry (he was trained as an architect), Sharp's first hotel in 1961 was a real estate play. "I didn't know what to do, but I approached it from the customer's perspective. What would they need? What would be of value to them?

"That was the original thought. That strategy hasn't changed today."

Like other businesses, the Four Seasons is riding out the current recession as best it can. With almost 50 years in the industry, Sharp brings some perspective to the problem. These downturns come every seven to 10 years, "It's not the first. It won't be the last."

The Four Seasons has survived them in the past – the one after 9/11 was particularly "serious," he said – and is doing so today by negotiating with clients over rates, while not eroding the standards that customers have come to expect.

As for the future, Sharp predicts the chain will better address clients' concerns about the environment with the hotel conserving energy and providing "better air to breathe."

Once systems are put in place to satisfy those desires, they will likely become the new standard and be required everywhere. After all, he said, "expectations must be met."

Return to Auschwitz

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Five years after Michael Englishman recited Kaddish at Birkenau for his parents, his siblings and other family members who perished there, his 16-year-old great-granddaughter completed a sacred task on his behalf when she followed in his footsteps on the recent March of the Living.

Morgan Kaufman, 16, a Grade 11 student at Greenwood College School in Toronto, brought two copies of her late great-grandfather's autobiography, 163256: A Memoir of Resistance (Wilfred Laurier University Press, 2007), to the Auschwitz Jewish Center in Poland.

"I liked the idea of bringing the book to the place where the events described by my opa actually happened," she said in an interview that also included her mother, Lisa Kaufman, and grandmother, Katy Brass.

Morgan visited the building where the number 163256 was tattooed on her great-grandfather's arm, and she said he was foremost in her thoughts on the silent march from Auschwitz to Birkenau on Yom Hashoah.

"I thought, 'I am marching for my opa.' I kept thinking that he walked this path when he was in Auschwitz."

By coincidence, this meeting with three generations of Englishman's family happened to fall on two poignant anniversaries.

It was exactly two years since his book was published – he died four months later– and a year since his unveiling.

Brass struggled to hold back tears as she recalled the book launch at Israel's, which "sold out completely." Her father did not survive long enough after his cancer was diagnosed that year to attend a scheduled book signing at Chapters and the Jewish Book Fair.

Born in Amsterdam in 1921, Englishman (originally Engelschman) was the sole survivor of his immediate family. He lost his first wife, parents and four sisters in the Holocaust.

Between 1942 and 1945, he was interned in five concentration and labour camps: Vught in Holland; Auschwitz-Birkenau; Janina Grube coal mine; Buna-Monowitz IG Farben Works in Poland, and Dora-Nordhausen in Germany.

Brass said her father was a certified electrician who most likely survived the war because the Nazis valued his professional skills.

People didn't think he was Jewish, Kaufman added. By the end of his incarceration, her grandfather was working on rockets and other secret weapons. "When people did find out he was Jewish, he was too important to the project to be killed."

After the war, Englishman married Hendrika (Rita) Pels, a family friend who had also lost her spouse. She died in 2003. He adopted her two children. Brass and her brother, Philip Englishman, had been hidden in the Dutch countryside during the war.

The family immigrated to Canada in 1952. Englishman was a frequent speaker on the Holocaust, and he actively fought neo-Nazism.

Brass described her father as a pied piper. "People just loved him. He never had a bad word to say about anybody."

And he was funny, Kaufman said. "He used to tell my kids, 'Your camp was a lot more fun than mine.'"

Indeed in his book, Englishman offers a humorous response to a student's question about the food in concentration camp: "We never had to worry about too many calories."

Kaufman said her grandfather's lifelong mission was to educate people about the Holocaust, especially students. He wanted his autobiography to be accessible to younger readers as well as adults.

God is hidden in Tel Aviv's details: author

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

The creation of Tel Aviv – and Zionism as a whole – was largely an attempt to secularize space, to make what was the imagined biblical Land of Israel dreamed about and written about for thousands of years, into an actual place "with the attributes of home," says the author of a book about Israel's largest city.

Barbara Mann, the author of A Place in History, which chronicles how Tel Aviv became a bridge connecting the Holy Land with the modern western world, spoke at the Schulich School of Business on May 10 about the city, which this year celebrates its 100th anniversary.

Her lecture, "Tel Aviv at 100: From Sand Dunes To Skyscrapers," was part of a series co-ordinated by Sara Horowitz, director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

"Tel Aviv was founded primarily by immigrants and refugees coming from a variety of ethnic and class backgrounds. The immigrant who voluntarily settled in a new land out of an ideological belief in Jewish political autonomy and the refugee who [fled] an oppressive regime had radically different attitudes towards the meaning of Tel Aviv as their new home. One of the ways in which these disparities were ostensibly dissolved... was through the idea of Tel Aviv as a Jewish city," Mann said.

Although the city was founded in 1909, the origin of its name actually dates back several years earlier. Tel Aviv derives from the name "Altneuland," which literally means "Old New Land," the title of Theodor Herzl's 1902 book about a thriving utopian city along the Mediterranean seaboard that he believed would one day be realized as a Jewish homeland. Altneuland was later loosely translated by Nachum Sokoloff, president of the Zionist Organization of America, as Tel Aviv, or "Hill of Spring," a reflection of the essence of what the city meant to the immigrant settlers: the start of a new life and the revival of the optimism they once felt.

"The largely secular residents of Ahuzat Bayit, the neighbourhood that would become Tel Aviv, were committed to creating an urban space that would be everything Jewish life in Europe was not," Mann said.

The early buildings of the settlers were examples of the modern neo-classical style imported by architects from eastern Europe, who studied in cities such as Odessa and St. Petersburg, Mann said. Ironically, the settlers had also taken to mining the artistic influence of the German Bauhaus style to design Tel Aviv's architecture, an example of drawing on the past to pave a road for the future.

This seeming rejection of what they saw as antiquated notions of Judaism caused conflict between the Orthodox communities of Jerusalem and the more secular residents of Tel Aviv, Mann said.

The clash of interests was primarily due to architecture that was designed in what was considered the Greek spirit, such as artist Y.D. Gordon's monument over the entrance of the Hotel Ben Nahum at 32 Rothschild. The monument is of a rabbi and his two students surrounded by various animal life. To the Orthodox community, this was a desecration of Jewish values, a rebuke to the second commandment of making graven images as a substitute for God, she added.

Eventually, this architectural style was accepted. "In a sense, it was as if Jewish ethics and its aversion to esthetics had finally found in the specifics of the international style, a physical form that would not offend those normative, ingrained attitudes against esthetic representation," Mann said.

Even in a mostly acculturated community such as Tel Aviv's, God remains hidden in the details, she said.

Awards night recognizes student leadership

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

The outstanding student leadership in Toronto is a testament to the commitment of the Jewish community here to not only persevere, but triumph in the face of adversity.

"The events this year on campus were not business as usual," Hillel Board president Allan Berdowski said at the 13th annual Hillel Awards Night on May 14. He cited the very public displays of anti-Semitism on college campuses, the anti-Zionist rhetoric used by students and organizations as its springboard. However, he also reminded attendees that this was a special year in which "to celebrate tenacity, pride and leadership" shown by both Jewish and non-Jewish students.

Despite the turmoil, including a three-month long strike of teaching assistants and contract faculty at York University, the 2008-2009 semester saw the launch of many new programs and initiatives that helped keep the Hillel spirit alive across all campuses.

This year marked the creation of the Jewish Life on Campus initiative, which, Berdowski said, "formed a strong partnership between Hillel and the Orthodox Union and attracted close to 200 students on a weekly basis."

Other programs and events launched this past school year included a two-day UN rally retreat in New York City, the formation of Jew.ru to engage students of Russian heritage, the Israel Advocacy Program and a program in partnership with Hillel Israel to help Tibetan refugees in India. The Artzy Festival multimedia art exhibit was held at the Bata Shoe Museum for the second year, and a Yom Ha'atzmaut barbecue celebrating Israel's 61st birthday "once again showed us the power of free food," Berdowski said jokingly.

In his keynote speech, Hillel executive director Zac Kaye called this year's events "a wake-up call to all of us involved in campus life."

Kaye also spoke of "expanding Hillel's vision" and praised the "unique entity" that is Hillel in the way it welcomes students and people of all races, ethnicities and religions, an example he hopes all organizations will follow in the future.

MCs Michal Brosh and Jeremy Bluvol provided light banter during the awards ceremony at Adath Israel Congregation and introduced the presenters for each of the 16 award categories, including campus awards for Ryerson University, Universiy of Toronto and York University; city awards; and the Singer-Lieberman Hadracha Award for leadership, which was given to seven students.

Among the students honoured with the leadership award was Ryan Leszner, one of three from the York campus. He was praised for his "mad musical skills, positive nature and passion for Jewish life."

Current Hillel at York president Daniel Ferman received the Gropper Family Award for outstanding leadership as well as the Singer-Lieberman Hadracha Award.

Samahra Zatzman picked up the Prutschi Family Award for tzedek and social justice and the AEPi Award for partnership and outreach for her work on the Bathtub Project, which collects toiletries for shelters for battered women.

Doubling Your GIC Returns

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 8% Plus

With interest rates at their lowest level in 40 years and stock markets in the doldrums, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free returned to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield.

The following example, compares the investment of $200,000 invested in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a male aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

As the date nears for York University's two-day academic conference called Israel Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace, Jewish groups are continuing to express concern that the event will promote the Israel boycott movement.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) released a joint statement last week condemning the June 22-24 conference, which is being co-sponsored by Queen's University and York, and is an official part of York's 50th anniversary celebrations.

The groups' statement said the conference will focus on a one-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinians conflict – "a solution that would spell the end of Israel as a Jewish state" – and that the speakers, some of whom are involved in the "boycott, divestment and sanctions" campaign against Israel, will use the forum to promote anti-Israel views.

York's president, Mamdouh Shoukri, released a statement in response to complaints that the conference should not be part of anniversary events.

"This would have involved excluding a conference because of its subject matter, which would in itself have been a fundamental violation of academic freedom," Shoukri said.

He added that the organizers and academics have the freedom to explore such issues, and it would be inappropriate for the university to intervene.

"[T]he choice of topic, of who is to speak, and of what is said at the event lies squarely with the individual academics who organize and/or participate in it and no one else. The university provides a forum for the robust exchange, but does not align itself with a particular set of views or positions."

The Jewish Defence League's (JDL) national director, Meir Weinstein, who promised earlier this month that he would hold weekly demonstrations at York to protest the conference, said he was picketing on campus on May 15 when a York security guard handed him a letter written by Harriet Lewis, York's general counsel.

The letter said that York was aware of the JDL's plans to hold weekly demonstrations on campus, but that the Jewish organization, an "outside group," did not have permission from York "to use our campus lands for protests."

Lewis added that future demonstrations on York property will be considered trespassing and urged the JDL to hold future protests on public property.

Weinstein said when he was handed the letter, he and about 25 others were picketing peacefully on the sidewalk outside York's Vari Hall rotunda.

Despite the letter's request that the JDL not protest on York property in the future, Weinstein said he planned to be back at York the following week. However, he said he was considering splitting the demonstrators into two groups – one at an entrance to the school, which is considered public property, and another in front of Vari Hall.

"Some of the people in the JDL are students at York. Does that mean that they don't have the right [to picket on campus]?" Weinstein said.

He said that he's been in contact with the Canadian Civil Liberties Association about York's letter, and while it had not yet responded, he said "they expressed interest."

Students penalized for anti-Semitic slurs

York University has sanctioned and reprimanded two students for their involvement in a Feb. 11 incident in which Jewish students were barricaded in the Hillel lounge by a group of students yelling anti-Semitic and anti-Israel slurs.

Last week, associate dean of Osgoode Hall Law School and York adjudicator Janet Mosher found that Krisna Saravanamuttu, the incoming president of York Federation of Students (YFS), and York student Jesse Zimmerman violated York's student code of conduct for their involvement in the incident.

Mosher said that they made Jewish students feel "intimidated, frightened, tense and nervous" and promoted an atmosphere of "hostility, incivility and intimidation."

Saravanamuttu got a formal reprimand on his academic record for two years, a $150 fine, and was ordered to take a training session through York's Centre for Human Rights on equality, free speech and respect. He also must write a 15-page essay about fostering a campus free of discrimination, harassment and intimidation.

Zimmerman received a formal reprimand on his academic record for one year and must write a formal apology to the complainants. He'll also be required to take training sessions at the Centre for Human Rights and write a 15-page essay.

Hillel at York President Daniel Ferman said that he hopes the ruling will pressure Saravanamuttu to step down as incoming YFS president.

"I think he needs to respond to these things and see what he's willing to do to make sure students feel safe on campus. Obviously, we need a campus free of racism, and we can't have the president involved in these types of incidents," Ferman said. – S.S.

Bike ride raises funds for terror victims

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

June 1, 2001, started out as a typical Saturday night in Tel Aviv. The city was bustling with people milling about on the streets or hanging out at their favourite haunts.

The Dolphinarium, a seaside discotheque, was a popular hot spot for teenage immigrants from the former Soviet Union. On this Saturday night, dozens of high schoolers crowded outside the entrance.

Irina Lipkin-Mejberg

Irina Lipkin-Mejberg, who was 17 at the time, was among them. She says she doesn't remember seeing the 17-year-old suicide attacker who infiltrated the crowd, but she'll never forget the moment he blew himself up. Her best friend was one of the 21 people who died that night.

Most of the victims were high school students like herself.

"Nobody thinks about a terrorist attack on a discotheque for teenagers," says the recent immigrant to Canada. "These were 15- and 16-year-olds."

On May 31, a day before the eighth anniversary of the bombing, Lipkin-Mejberg will be on hand for the fifth annual One Family Fund Bike Ride, which this year is in memory of the victims of the Dolphinarium bombing. It's sponsored by the One Family Fund of Canada, which is affiliated with the Israeli organization that helps Israeli victims of violence.

It will be the first time that Lipkin-Mejberg will be observing the anniversary of the June 1 attack in Canada, which means she'll be without her usual group of Israeli supporters.

She says the survivors and family and friends of the victims visit the site annually and re-enact the scene.

"We all stand in the places we were in at the exact hour of the explosion, but every year, fewer and fewer people come out. I feel badly about not being there this year."

"I said, 'Let's make the ride in honour of the victims,'" Albert recalls.

There are two routes, one 20 kilometres, the other 50 kilometres. Both begin at 9:30 a.m. at Toogood Pond Park in Unionville near Main and Carlton streets.

The event, which is being organized by Marsha Gallinger, begins with registration and breakfast at 8:30 a.m.

Albert notes that last year's event brought in $80,000, so she encourages participants to raise the $500 registration fee for the ride, which is geared to people of all ages and ability.

"We would love the community to come and show their support and solidarity for the victims of the Dolphinarium bombing and other victims of violence."

She also invites people to participate in the second annual Cross Israel Hike. This year's route runs through the canyons near Eilat to the southern tip of Israel, a distance of 60 kilometres, will be covered over five days from Oct. 25 to 29.

Lipkin-Mejberg, a makeup artist by training, says life in Canada is giving her a fresh start. She's looking forward to studying fine arts at York University this fall.

She says the emotional impact of the Dolphinarium attack led to her suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. She experienced severe mood changes, becoming highly anxious and more sensitive. "My husband [Vladimir Mejberg], he was my boyfriend at the time of the bombing, had to be very patient with me."

She describes the bombing as "the end of her innocence," explaining that it changed her perspective on life. "I suddenly grew up."

While time has helped ease the emotional wounds, Lipkin-Mejberg says she is still haunted by the memory of the bombing. "It can come from nowhere, and when it comes, it hits hard."

If you have something to say about York University... we're listening

Our new Commission on the Quality of Life for Jewish Students at York University would like to hear from you in order to assist York in ensuring a safe, welcoming environment for all students.

Here are the questions we would like you to answer:

- What direct personal experiences concerning the quality of Jewish life can you tell us about related to safety, the atmosphere inside or outside the classroom or the overall campus environment?
- What practical suggestions do you have to improve the quality of life for Jewish students on campus? Please focus your suggestions on what steps the university should take to encourage a safe, positive environment, free from intimidation, harassment and discrimination.

Your responses will be part of a report that our commission is submitting to a York University task force. Please send your submissions to yorkcommission@ujafed.org by the end of the day, Monday, June 1.

Shelter planned for women, kids

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Funds from its second annual gala, held May 14 at Liberty Grand and featuring a performance by Tony Bennett, are going toward expanding its emergency shelter for women and children, located in Vaughan.

Arlene Margolese, ETA Vaughan co-chair along with Sunder Singh and Marie Fiorellino-DiPoce, said the current shelter opened about six months ago. It operates as emergency housing for 10 to 12 people, as well as an outreach, therapy and counselling centre.

"It welcomes all religious and cultural groups, and provides vegetarian, halal and kosher foods when necessary. It is important that all groups feel welcome."

Their next project is to expand the building to include at least 32 bedrooms plus a living area and a kosher kitchen, and a meditation room without religious artifacts so everyone can use it comfortably, Margolese said.

"While at the shelter, residents will be provided with counselling and vocational training so they can build their skills and employment opportunities. Transportation will be arranged for the children's schooling and doctor appointments, and for the women to get to employment interviews."

Margolese, manager of volunteer services and faith and cultural services at Reena, said the seeds for the shelter were planted when Michael Di Biase, former mayor of Vaughan, put together a task force to determine the need for a women's shelter in that city.

"As members of the task force, we found that there was a need for a shelter that could protect women and children living in abusive situations. At that time, however, there was no money for the project, so the three of us began looking into how we could move forward."

They lobbied the community, "and we were lucky enough to find a benefactor in John dePoce who leased us a parcel of land including a house that had good 'bones' but needed a lot of renovations to pass inspection. He spent about $220,000 of his own money on renovations and furnishings."

The board feels so strongly about the project, she said, "because abuse is rampant, and shelters are full."

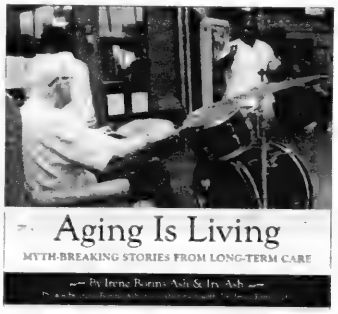
Seniors in long-term care focus of new book

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A Toronto social worker and photographer has compiled a book about seniors living in long-term care facilities that focuses on the positive aspects of the lives of some residents.



For Aging Is Living: Myth-Breaking Stories from Long-Term Care (Dundurn Press), published in 2009, Irene Borins Ash gathered the stories of 25 long-term care residents from different cultural and socio-economic backgrounds. The book is illustrated with her photographs of the residents.

Borins Ash makes a strong case for changing attitudes about long-term care living. She has worked in long-term care homes, a retirement home and a home support agency, and she dispels the widely held negative perception of life in these facilities and debunks the attitude that people go there to die.

"Staying at home when care needs are round the clock and a person is housebound creates social isolation, which is bad for your physical and mental health," she said.

Irene Borins Ash

Her book shows that people in nursing homes can thrive because their care needs are provided for and because they are offered a variety of social programs.

"The family of the resident can also be released from survival mode to mend relationships and enjoy each other's company. I found that many of these people were forgotten and had become invisible in society," Borins Ash said.

"Many residents continue to pursue personal interests, activities and relationships that give meaning and quality to their lives."

Borins Ash has had three photo exhibits and authored a 2003 book titled Treasured Legacies: Older and Still Great" (Second Story Press), which features photographic portraits of seniors accompanied by biographical sketches.

Dr. William Reichman, president and CEO of Baycrest, said that Aging Is Living is a "reminder to those of us in leadership roles that institutionalized care environments must be creatively driven to enable people, including those with dementia and extreme physical frailty, to reach their full potential in remaining actively engaged in life."

In the foreword of Aging Is Living, David Onley, the lieutenant-governor of Ontario, who is disabled, wrote: "As a lifelong champion of disability issues, I am delighted that Irene Borins Ash has turned her discerning eye and camera lens to the positive aspects of living in long-term care.

"She has done a great service, not just to her subjects, whose lives and achievements deserve public recognition, but also to those who, whether considering or forced by circumstances to choose long-term care, wish to address the negative images of aging in a nursing home."

Dr. Irvin Rubincam helped Borins Ash with the photography and her husband, Irv, co-authored Aging Is Living.

In Part 1 of the book, various long-term care residents look back on their lives and speak candidly about what is important to them.

Part 2 of the book includes Debby Vigoda's story. Vigoda, who served as executive director of the Ontario Gerontology Association for 18 years, writes of the challenges of having her husband, Morris, move to a long-term care facility after an accident, and the anguish and trauma of the decision making.

Vigoda said her husband and their children agreed that it was an appropriate decision. Vigoda caregiver's checklist, titled "If I don't take care of me, I can't take care of him," accompanies her story.

The book's information section also includes 21 key points about people who have aged with a healthy attitude; lists of long-term care facilities with levels of care; a long-term care home checklist, and tips for planning as a person ages.

"The people profiled in the book will leave a legacy, a gift to others. They had the courage and sense of adventure to enter into this project and to allow me to share some of their innermost thoughts." Borins-Ash said.

A portion of the author's proceeds from the book will be donated to Pat's Place, a program operated out of Family Service Toronto that helps abused seniors.

Aging Is Living: Myth-Breaking Stories from Long-Term Care is available at major bookstores. For more information about Aging Is Living, visit www.ireneborinsash.com.

Nazi-confiscated Stern art goes on display

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Nazi-confiscated painting that was the subject of a three-year legal battle between the estate of Jewish art dealer Max Stern and an elderly, German-born baroness was unveiled in a ceremony at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts on May 20.

This may be the first in more than 70 years that Girl from the Sabine Mountains, painted by Franz Xaver Winterhalter in the 1830s, has been on public view, said Clarence Epstein, who heads the Stern restitution and educational project, based at Concordia University.

The picture was displayed at the museum alongside the six other paintings – dating as far back as the 16th century – recovered through the project since 2005, the first time they have been shown altogether, or perhaps, since they hung in the Stern gallery in prewar Düsseldorf.

Stern – who owned the Dominion Gallery on Sherbrooke Street for more than 40 years and became one of Canada's most prominent art dealers – was forced to sell off his holdings in the 1930s by Nazi authorities, who barred Jews from the art trade. He died in 1987.

The Winterhalter was among the 228 paintings, the last of Stern's prewar inventory, that went on the block at the Lempertz auction house in Cologne in 1937 and sold for a fraction of their worth. It was featured prominently in the catalogue accompanying that sale.

The purchaser was a doctor, Karl Wilhelm, the stepfather of Maria Louise Bissonnette of Providence, R.I., who inherited the painting from her mother many years ago. She refused to hand over the work to the estate after it made a claim.

The estate tried unsuccessfully to reach an out-of-court settlement, but just before it launched legal proceedings, Bissonnette spirited the canvas out of the United States to Germany in an apparent bid to have that country's justice system rule on who its rightful owner is and where it had remained until now.

Late last year, a U.S. appeals court decided the painting belongs to the Stern estate and ruled that the German government's forcing of its sale and that of the 227 other paintings auctioned off in 1937 was "de facto confiscation," making them, in effect, stolen property that should be pursued as such.

That ruling was precedent-setting and marked a "new era" for the Stern project, Epstein said. Two Stern paintings were recovered by U.S. law enforcement officials within the past month. Both had been in the possession of New York art dealers, who had unwittingly bought them, and both had been placed very recently on the market by Lempertz, the same auction house that handled the Nazi-forced sale.

Thomas Kline, the Washington, D.C., lawyer who represented the estate and attended the ceremony, said this was the first U.S. decision equating a Nazi-forced sale with theft, and according to U.S. law and in most English-speaking countries, a person who buys stolen goods does not become the legal owner and the victim, or his heirs, always remains the owner.

He hopes the landmark ruling will persuade others possessing Holocaust-era confiscated art to settle amicably, but, if the legal route is taken, that courts elsewhere will be more open to viewing such art as having been confiscated.

Stern and his wife, Iris, who were childless, left their estate equally to three universities. Concordia president Judith Woodsworth, McGill University principal Heather Munroe-Blum, and Nathan Lindenberg of Toronto, president of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the third beneficiary, had the honour of removing the black cover from the Winterhalter, a bucolic picture of a slumbering young woman.

The paintings are on loan to the museum, and some were immediately afterward put on view with its permanent collection.

Among those in the audience was Richard Feigen, the prominent New York art dealer and collector who returned the most recently recovered painting, the circa-1595 Italian Baroque rendition of St. Jerome in the Wilderness.

Feigen told reporters he contacted the estate right away after reading in the New York Times about the return last month of another Stern painting, a 17th-century Dutch picture of a bagpiper that was traced by U.S. Homeland Security Department investigators to another New York dealer.

What particularly caught his attention was that this dealer had bought the painting from a British dealer, who in turn had purchased it through Lempertz.

Feigen had bought the Italian painting by Ludovico Carracci through Lempertz in 2000, paying a reported 100,000 Deutsche marks – about $685,000 (US) at current rates. He said it had been hanging in his home since then and he had no intention of selling it. But he didn't hesitate to return it to the Stern estate.

Feigen said he thinks Lempertz should compensate him, but he hasn't taken any steps to make a claim, on the advice of Homeland Security to hold off for now.

"They [Lempertz] may not have to abide by American law, but they may have to abide by American publicity… I guess they do not like the adverse publicity that they have been recycling plundered art."

As for U.S. collectors and dealers in possession of confiscated art, Feigen said, "I think they will be less tempted to challenge ownership now."

Lempertz, however, disputes that it bears any responsibility.

In a May 6 letter published in The CJN's Montreal edition, the auction house's legal adviser, Karl-Sax Feddersen, wrote that Stern, "after being forced to liquidate his gallery by the Reich Chamber of Culture, decided to auction the contents of his gallery via Kunsthaus Lempertz… This decision was based on many years of business relations between the Stern Gallery and the auction house.

"Max Stern was involved in compiling the relevant catalogue. The earnings that the auction strived towards were commensurate with the pricing of the time. After the auction, the auction proceeds were remitted to him. If the revenue authorities later confiscated the proceeds, this no longer falls under the jurisdiction of our company."

Feddersen added that, after the war, Stern stayed in touch with Lempertz. "On no occasion did he demand the return of the paintings auctioned off in 1937, nor any compensation. In a lawsuit in the Düsseldorf regional court in 1964, he was compensated for loss of assets suffered."

Race relations tribute wall unveiled

Founding members of the former city of North York's race relations committee gathered May 7 to reminisce about their role in helping address racism in Toronto. Established by then-North York mayor Mel Lastman in 1979 "in response to the emerging needs of [the city's] diverse multicultural population," the committee served as a model for similar initiatives in municipalities across Canada, a statement for the event said. Standing in front of the newly erected wall in the North York Civic Centre are founding members, from left, Bromley Armstrong, former Liberal MP Jean Augustine, Chimbo Poe Mutumba, Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, Wilma Mercury (wife of founding member Al Mercury), Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber, Rev. Massey Lombardi and Bhausaheb Ubale. "There was an intermingling of people of race in this committee… and none of us could have known this would spark similar [initiatives] in the future," Rabbi Bielfeld recalled at the ceremony.

School rapped for Hamas lesson

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

RICHMOND, B.C. — A Richmond, B.C., public school has come under fire after a Grade 6 teacher gave a class about violence in the Middle East using teaching material that said Hamas causes "relatively little damage to Israel" and didn't mention that Ottawa considers it a terror group.

Principal Patrick Von Hahn of William Bridge Elementary School said the parents of a Jewish student complained about the depiction of Hamas in What In The World?, a current events newsletter published by Victoria, B.C.-based LesPlan Educational Services.

The material described Hamas as "the Palestinian militant Islamic group that has governed Gaza since 2007. It operates social programs and builds schools, hospitals and religious institutions. Outside Gaza, however, Hamas is known for its violent activities. These include firing rockets and sending suicide bombers into Israel to attack civilians. The aim of Hamas is to set up an Islamic state in all of historic Palestine (much of what is now Israel and home to 7.1 million).

"The organization has tens of thousands of supporters in Gaza. But not all Palestinians support Hamas. Many disagree with the group's violent tactics. They cause relatively little damage to Israel, but result in massive retaliation by the Israeli army. Many countries, including Israel, the United States and the European Union regard Hamas as a terrorist organization."

Eric Wieczorek, president of LesPlan, said there was no intention to downplay the fact that Canada also considers Hamas to be a terrorist organization.

"On further review if we do that article again, I'll take a good, long look at that, and if Canada needs to be included as one of the countries that considers Hamas to be a terrorist organization, we will include it," he said. "Canada's not a major player in the Middle East situation, while the U.S. is. But there was no intent to downplay Hamas' terrorist activities."

Von Hahn said that What In The World? is a supplementary resource that the school subscribes to. He said there has been only one complaint about the material, and he's uncertain how many Jewish students attend the school.

"How [What in the World?] represented Hamas is always a matter of perspective," he said. "Any time you teach a current event, there's political bias that people are going to have, so there's sometimes bias in the classroom. But as educators, we want to make sure we stay away from this and present things as objectively as possible."

Von Hahn said he had not read this particular issue of What In The World? prior to its use in the classroom and wouldn't comment on whether or not it presented the issue it dealt with objectively.

The material's suggested list of classroom questions and issues for discussion included this: "Consider the following quote by a 14-year-old boy in the West Bank: 'What the Israeli forces are doing in Gaza is against the whole Palestinian people, not just against Hamas.' What is your understanding of the above quote? Respond to the quote. For what reasons do you agree with the speaker? For what reasons do you disagree?"

Wieczorek said the newsletter has covered the Middle East at least 20 times since its inception in 1990.

"I have a background in law and history, although I am not a 'Middle East specialist,' and I recognize that this lengthy conflict is very complicated and emotional for many people. I am sorry to hear one parent in Richmond, B.C. objected to the issue," he wrote in a formal response.

"Please be advised that our professional approach is to provide fair and balanced coverage. We do not take sides, and we are very careful to ensure that we live up to these standards. We select stories and provide the most current and accurate information from reputable news sources, such as the BBC, the CBC, and the Globe and Mail."

Wieczorek said he didn't write or research the article in question himself, and he noted that his list of subscribers includes several Jewish day schools in Canada.

"Three and a half months after publishing that newsletter, we get one complaint," he said. "That tells me the vast majority of people out there don't see a problem with what we published."

Hebrew U showcased

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Canada-Israel Committee and Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU) recently held a joint event on Parliament Hill to commemorate the 61st year of Canada-Israel relations.

In his last official appearance as president of CFHU, Ron Appleby noted that it was appropriate the event was being held on May 14, "which is the actual anniversary of the establishment of the State of Israel."

"Hebrew University is an outstanding, world-class institute of higher education. It has nurtured and developed most of the business, academic and professional leaders in Israel. It has been responsible for shaping and forming the liberal democracy that is Israel. Throughout its existence, medical research at the highest level for all mankind has been a priority of Hebrew University," Appleby said as he introduced a video highlighting some of the scientific and medical partnerships between Israel and Canada through the Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada.

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Miriam Ziv, congratulated the efforts made to date but urged even further co-operation between Canada and the Jewish state.

"I think that what we have seen today is proof of so many opportunities which should catch on. Let's give a hand to further co-operation between Israel and Canada," she said.

James Lunney, chair of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Committee, and Carmi Gillon, Hebrew U's vice-president for external relations brought greetings. The luncheon was prepared by Oved Alfia, executive chef at the Dan Tel Aviv Hotel, who showcased a "taste of Israel."

Winnipeg CJA campaign falls short of target

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's 2008-09 Combined Jewish Appeal campaign may have fallen short of its target for the first time in 10 years, but campaign officials aren't complaining.

"Our campaign was flat last year, but we at least matched the dollar figures [$5.3 million] that we raised in 2007-2008," said CJA Winnipeg executive director Elaine Goldstine. "Many other communities weren't able to reach the totals they hit the year before."

Goldstine said the goal for 2008-09 was $5.5 million. While the local line held its own, she added, contributions to Israel dropped slightly. (Winnipeg is the only Jewish community in North America that still has a two-line system, which gives contributors the option of allocating all or part of their donations to the local community or Israel.)

Rael Ludwig, a Winnipeg lawyer who is in his second year as overall campaign chair, said his committee hasn't set financial targets for the 2009-10 campaign.

"People are assessing their portfolios and may not be able to increase their gifts," he said. "We dodged two bullets last year. The economic collapse happened in mid-campaign, so we were able to break even. Also, we didn't have any money invested with [convicted New York-based pyramid scammer] Bernie Madoff."

Ludwig said that a March 30 campaign meeting generated a lot of enthusiasm among younger canvassers about next year's drive.

"We brought in Susan Jackson [from the Toronto UJA campaign] to act as a facilitator to give us some new ideas for the campaign and how to motivate donors," Ludwig said.

He recalled that, years ago, most canvassers were volunteers. Now, half the canvassing is done by paid staff.

"We would like to get back to where more of the canvassing is done by volunteers," he said.

One of the issues that the campaign organizers are debating this year, Ludwig said, is whether or not to continue to operate a two-line campaign. Another change under consideration is whether or not to allow all donors to designate which beneficiaries receive their donations. In the past, only major donors have had that option.

The new chair of the campaign's Women's Division for 2009-10 is Marcia Cosman, a third-generation community leader. Cosman has been a CJA canvasser for 25 years. She joined the CJA management team two years ago.

"We are looking forward to having more programs this year to show women what we do and hopefully inspire them to give more," Cosman said.

"We are optimistic that we can continue to raise the money we require to fund the services that our community needs," Goldstine said.

Luncheon to help at-risk girls in Israel

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — When Sylvia Katz read about a rehabilitation farm for at-risk girls in Israel's Jordan Valley, she knew she had to help. And now she is asking her community to lend a hand, too.

The great-grandmother and longtime volunteer and fundraiser has planned a luncheon for Sunday, June 7, in Hamilton to raise funds for Ginat Eden.

Ginat Eden is home to about 15 young women, aged 12 to 20, who have experienced family turmoil and trauma from terrorism. Some have had problems with substance abuse, as well as having low self-esteem. The farm is a therapeutic environment, where the girls live, work and study. They study and develop their talents at the farm, and their farming responsibilities foster a sense of self-worth.

After Katz read about the farm in The CJN about four years ago, she started sending annual contributions to the farm.

"It just wouldn't leave me," she said. "Learning about this unique school in a country riddled with so many problems tugged at my heart. I felt compelled to make others aware of the important work of Ginat Eden and to enlist their support in this worthy cause."

Sylvia Katz

She sent letters to her children, grandchildren and friends, and soon they formed a committee.

"I got them all working, and they will be busy that day," Katz said, adding the event will include a homemade lunch and desserts, and entertainment by jazz pianist and vocalist Fern Lindzon, violinist Bianca Lequit and guitarist Ralph Rosal.

Despite her protests, the committee thought that more tickets would be sold if the luncheon also honoured Katz.

Her daughter, Beverley Abramson, said her parents taught their family the importance of mitzvah and of giving their time.

Born in Toronto, Katz moved to Hamilton in 1940, when she married her late husband, Nathan. They became members of Adas Israel Congregation in 1964. The couple volunteered for many projects, especially for Israel and in the local Hamilton community.

"My mother still knocks on doors or telephones in her capacity as a lifelong fundraiser. Admirers of my mother have donated money to various causes, dedicating their gift in her name," Abramson said in an e-mail. "One in particular is an annuity to Shalom Village, a senior citizens' home in Hamilton."

Katz's great-grandchildren are continuing the tradition. Five of them recently sold daffodils to support cancer research, and one donated the proceeds from her jewelry making and her bat mitzvah gifts to charity.

The luncheon takes place in the Dundas area of Hamilton. For location information and tickets, call Howard Katz at 905-527-8901 or Beverley Abramson at 416-960-9044.

Rex Murphy lays bare play's moral inversion

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Two weeks ago (May 14th issue) this column focused on the controversy over Caryl Churchill's short play Seven Jewish Children, which was staged this month in Toronto and Montreal. That should have been enough said on that subject. This week's column was supposed to address the media's treatment of the May 18 meeting in Washington between Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and U.S. President Barack Obama. However, since more has been written recently about Churchill's play, and further controversy has been stirred up as a result, it's important to take another look.

Yoni Goldstein, a gifted and insightful writer for the National Post, wrote an illogical piece titled "Nuanced, not anti-Semitic" (May 19th). He argued that Churchill's 10-minute play is a "nuanced piece of writing" and not, as many critics have claimed, "a one-sided diatribe against Israel inhumanness."

However, Goldstein then refuted himself when he acknowledged that Churchill draws an analogy between the Holocaust suffered by Jews under the Nazis and "another, newer, genocide of the Palestinians perpetrated by Israel." Perversely, Goldstein wrote that this is "the worst" one can say about the play. What is worse than implying that Israelis are acting like Nazis? There is nothing "nuanced" about this absurd allegation, which means any claim that the play is a "nuanced piece of writing" shouldn't be taken seriously.

While some defenders of Churchill have argued that she is simply criticizing – strongly, but fairly – the actions of the Israeli government in Gaza, at least Goldstein recognized the linkage she made between Israelis and Nazis, even if he failed to denounce the linkage for the outrageous, hideous slander that it is.

For this very reason, many liberals, such as British novelist Howard Jacobson, have accused Churchill of perpetrating the big lie. How did Goldstein miss this?

Unfortunately, Goldstein only compounded his misjudgment the following day when he wrote, in response to a letter writer taking exception to the Nazi analogy, the following: "Seven Jewish Children was written by Caryl Churchill, not me. To argue, as I have, that the play links the Holocaust to the genocide of the Palestinians by the Israelis is much, much different than arguing that the latter genocide in fact exists."

This defence is, frankly, incoherent. Had Goldstein put the word "genocide" in ironic quotes where it belongs, or had he written a satire (a parody) of what defenders of Churchill are saying, he might have made sense. Unfortunately, simply repeating what Churchill's play asserts, without pointing out its factual baselessness and its absurdity, only lends it an air of plausibility.

What's especially disturbing is that the most hideous things said about Jews and Israelis – which used to be confined to the margins of the extreme right and extreme left – are now making their way into mainstream discourse as "fair comment." Objections to such calumnies are often parried with the accusation, "How dare you try to silence me with the charge of anti-Semitism!" Entirely missed in this sordid affair is that words and facts matter, and that with words comes responsibility – the responsibility to be fair and accurate.

In "A distasteful display of agitprop" (Globe and Mail, May 16), commentator and CBC Radio host Rex Murphy, who knows a thing or two about the meaning of words and their power, brilliantly dissected what Churchill's words amount to.

On the key point in question above, Murphy wrote: "It is the deepest, most radical insult to pass on Israel and Israelis to imply that they are now what Hitler and his demonic henchmen were then: that Israelis are the present world's Nazis. To my ear and mind, linking today's Jews of Israel to the Nazis – as is so frequently the case in the demonstrations and rhetoric of the 'anti-Zionists' – passes as something, in a curious and painful way, more baleful and morally astonishing than denying the Holocaust.

"About no other set of people could such a drama be written, or find audiences, than the Jews of Israel. Seven Jewish Children is a document of our age – not in the manner that 'progressive' thought would have it be. But as yet one more signal, though more sharply intense and fevered than all the rest, of how utterly inverted, how ferociously off track, the moral intelligence of our time has drifted."

האל אהב מאוד לשמוע,
הוא התחיל בדו מז'ור
ועבר למי מינור
והאל הרגיש כל כך נבוה.

זוכר, מתי ראית אותה,
עירומה על גג ביתה,
משתזפת היתה לאור הירח,

וכשהכרכה אותך לביתה,
קשרה אותך למיטתה,
ומשפתיך מילשה א הה

את יודעת, ניסיתי הכל,
כל מה שנעעתי נכשל בגדול,
מה לעשות, הכשלון יתום הוא,
אך אף על פי שהכל נכשל,
כשאסגור את האל מעל,
לא אתלונן, אומר ההללה

Dairy recipes for Shavuot

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Jewish people traditionally eat a dairy meal on Shavuot, the festival that marks the day the Israelites received the Torah at Mount Sinai. Some people say this dietary custom can be traced way back to that milestone in our history. When the Israelites accepted the commandments, they committed themselves to a life of restraint, and forgoing meat symbolizes this restraint.

There is also a theory that when the Israelites accepted the Torah and agreed to follow the dietary laws, they could not prepare kosher meat properly. Given this limitation, the Israelites therefore kept to a dairy diet as a means of keeping kosher.

A third theory, which also dates back to Sinai, is that Shavuot is linked to the Exodus and the Israelites' goal of reaching the "land of milk and honey." Eating dairy symbolizes this journey.

There are certainly many dairy dishes to choose from, but the foods that seem to be most connected with Shavuot are blintzes and cheesecake. These days, few people take the time to make blintzes, the crepe filled with seasoned or sweetened cottage cheese. On the patchkeh scale, they're up there, and they probably also score high on the Weight Watcher's point system, but there's nothing like homemade blintzes with sour cream, especially on Shavuot.

CHEESE BLINTZES

From The Complete American Jewish Cookbook (World Publishing)

Batter
1 cup sifted all purpose flour
1 tsp. salt
4 eggs, well beaten
1 cup milk or water
Filling
1 1/2 lb. dry cottage cheese
1 to 2 egg yolks beaten
1 tbsp. melted butter
salt, sugar and cinnamon to taste

For the batter, sift flour and salt together in a bowl. Mix egg with liquid in another bowl and stir in flour. Mix until smooth to form thin batter. Pour onto a hot greased skillet with enough batter to form a thin cake, tilting the pan from side to side so that the batter spreads evenly. Cook over low heat on one side until the pancake blisters. Turn out on clean towel cooked side up. Allow to cool. Repeat until all the batter is used up.

Make the filling. Mix cheese and egg yolk and butter and add seasoning to taste. Place a tablespoon of the cheese mixture in the centre of each pancake. Fold the edges over to form an envelope.

Fry in the blintz in butter until it is browned on both sides. Serve hot with sour cream or with cinnamon and sugar. Makes 10 blintzes.

LOW-FAT CHEESE BLINTZES

From The Vegetarian Times Complete Cookbook (Vegetarian Times magazine)

Crepe Batter
3/4 cup unbleached pastry flour
1 cup skim milk
4 tbsp. cornstarch
1 small banana, peeled and mashed
Filling
1 cup low-fat cottage cheese
1/4 cup raisins
1/4 tsp. ground cinnamon

Mix the batter ingredients in a bowl. Heat a nonstick pan lightly coated with nonstick cooking spray over medium heat. Pour about 6 or 7 tablespoons of batter into the pan to make a crepe. Lift and tilt pan gently to spread the batter evenly and thinly. Cook until top is slightly dry. Remove with a spatula and place on a napkin. Repeat with remaining batter.

Preheat the oven to 350. Combine the filling ingredients in a bowl. Place a few tablespoons of filling in the centre of each crepe. Roll up and fold the ends under to make rectangular "packages." Place the blintzes in a lightly oiled baking pan. Bake until golden, about 30 minutes. Makes 10 blintzes

SOUR CREAM AND CHEESE PANCAKES

From Second Helpings, Please (Mt. Sinai Montreal B'nai Brith Women)

1/2 lb. dry cottage cheese
1/2 cup sour cream
3 eggs, beaten
3/4 cup flour
1/8 tsp. baking powder salt, pepper and sugar to taste
butter for frying

Blend cheese and sour cream. Add eggs and seasoning. Sift dry ingredients together and add to batter. If the batter is too thick, add a little water. Drop by spoonfuls onto a preheated skillet, which has been well-greased with butter. Brown on both sides. Makes one dozen.

Summer is around the corner. We are thrilled to share with you some of our tips and products for this beautiful season.

Make sure to apply your SPF sunscreens if you spend a lot of time outdoors. Continue to moisturize during the day and evening, and wear a lip balm with SPF to avoid burned lips.

When it comes to makeup coverage, look for a tinted foundation that has an SPF. Most tinted products are hydrating for all skin types. Blush is colourful with shades of pink, orange and rose. Eye makeup is bold! Shades of green, violet and bright colours are hot; gold is the most popular shade. For evening makeup, eyes should be pronounced, with both eyeliner and loads of mascara or false eyelashes.

Lips finish this beautiful look you are trying to create, so pick colours of pink and metallic shades. Glossy lips are still quite a statement.

FIORIO – Maurice Fiorio says spring trends flow into summer nice and easy this season, as the grown-out bobs from fall are now long and ready for shaping.

The looks vary from long, sexy hair to the pixie crop and, of course, the ever-so-classic bob makes its appearance once again. If you keep your hair long, there are quite a few trends you can play with. Flowing movable hair is sexy and feminine – good for any occasion. Straight and sleek hair is classic and elegant for the boardroom or a night on the town. The 1940s mermaid waves make a comeback as an easy way to add a bit of drama to your look.

Braids are a hot trend for summer ,especially milkmaid braids. For a subtle yet sophisticated change to your everyday look, frame one side of your face with a small french braid. Up-dos are chic but effortless and naturally messy, and non-fussy ponytails are also key this summer.

Like skin, hair needs reliable protection and effective care when exposed to the sun. BC Sun Guardian's SolarCare-Technology from Schwarzkopf Professional delivers just the right amount of moisture, protection and repair to meet the specific demands of sun-stressed hair. BC Sun Guardian is the first group of products that offers a three-step care program that treats the hair before, during and after sun exposure, and leaves your hair shiny, healthy, manageable and frizz free.

LaCoupe orgnx offers perfect solutions that balance beauty and budget – top quality products at prices that would make any recessionista smile. The invigorating aroma, rich creamy texture and lustrous results of using LaCoupe orgnx EN|rich will make deep treatments a small, non-negotiable luxury in your hair-care regimen.

STACEY'S TIPS

SPA AND SKINCARE: Lise Watier invites you to celebrate summer in advance by setting sail for the sunny beaches of Bora Bora. Two new, complementary products have joined the ranks of the classic Teint Bora Bora Self-Tanning Gel Face and Body: introducing Gommage Bora Bora Exfoliating Gel Face and Body and Lait Bora Bora Hydrating Tan Extender Face and Body. Teint Bora Bora Self-Tanning Gel, a regular Lise Watier product, provides an ultra-natural, even tan while hydrating skin and leaving it incredibly silky-soft. The newest additions to the line help prepare skin for application of the self-tanning gel and make the tan last even longer.

Estée Lauder introduces new Advanced Night Repair Synchronized Recovery Complex. Inspired by groundbreaking DNA research, Estée Lauder scientists have created a product that revolutionizes skin's youthful look. Advanced Night Repair Synchronized Recovery Complex provides optimal night-time repair to skin's appearance, supporting the natural synchronization of skin's repair processes.

Launched nearly a year ago, L'Expérience by Lise Watier is exclusively dedicated to remarkably improving the overall appearance of mature skin. Now, two new products have been added to the L'Expérience line for an even more complete and effective cosmetic solution – the 24 Hour Dual Eye Contour Program, the first and only eye-contour care system in two formulas for continuous 24-hour action. It instantly smoothes by day and works to restructure skin by night. This innovative skin-care duo, sold as a single package, meets the special demands of the fragile skin around the eyes to give a visibly more youthful look.

Because today's woman does not necessarily want to change her body and be thin at all costs, and because many women simply want to maintain their figures or just feel better in their bodies, the Yves Rocher laboratories have created a new line of slimming spa products called Spa Végétal Mieux-Être du Corps. With this new spa line, slimming is truly enjoyable! Yves Rocher has selected plants derived from traditional Chinese botanicals to help you gracefully tone your body while you relax. Each product provides a different sensory experience. The rich formulas are perfect for massaging, and fragrances surround you with their heady scent. Products include 2 in 1 Hydrating & Slimming, 3D Action Slimming Serum, and Slimming Massage Oil.

FRANCINE'S TIPS

Your morning just got a whole lot easier. Cargo's new 7 in 7 kit gives you the seven tried-and-true must-haves to get you out the door in no time flat. This limited-edition kit includes OneBase (concealer and foundation in one), Essential Palette (four eye shadows), Eye Liner (new), LashActivator, BeachBlush (blush and bronzer together), Reverse Lip Liner (the only lip liner for gloss) and, to finish this amazing kit, (new!) Classic Gloss with Timestrip Technology (non-sticky lip gloss).

Lancôme Paris is proud to introduce Ageless Minérale with White Sapphire Complex, an ultra-fine loose Mineral Powder Foundation that can be used alone or with Setting And Perfecting Mineral Powder. Talc-free and never cakey, the powders wear beautifully for hours without irritating the skin.

7-7 Cargo Kit: Tried-and-true must haves.

Never before have we seen the "wild things" of the world come together in so many bold new combinations as with M·A·C's selection of all-over summer bronzing shades for lips, cheeks, eyes and nails. This beautiful selection is exotically packaged in stylized zebra and leopard prints.

EYE MAKEUP: Lise Watier presents a collection of loose-powder eye shadows formulated with mineral pigments that are gentle on the eyelids. You can apply dry on the eyelid for amazing colour, as well as applying wet to turn it into a fabulous eyeliner. M·A·C Colourcraft has now designed New Mineralized Eye Shadows that have a unique design that combines new hues in modern ways. Four shades create a pinwheel design in one compact.

Cargo introduces a safe and effective lash-growing formula that performs. Thirty days is all it takes to give the appearance of longer, thicker lashes. Use LashActivator alone or under your favourite mascara.

Revlon is proud to introduce ColorStay Liquid Eye Pen, a felt-tip liquid eyeliner for controlled application. It creates a precise line from soft to dramatic and wears up to 16 hours. It won't smudge or smear all day.

LIPS: Lise Watier introduces Sun Smart Lips SPF15, a hydrating lip balm that protects against the sun's harmful UV rays. It goes on clear, without leaving any white residue.

For all the brides to be, new Revlon ColorStay Ultimate Liquid Lipstick is the first only one-step lip colour that is food-proof, stays comfortable for up to 12 hours and requires no topcoat for comfortable wear. No touch-ups are required even after meals. You can now get intense shine, constant conditioning and fuller lips in one slim lip-gloss stick.

Introducing Estée Lauder's new Pure Color Gloss Stick – a rich formula that melts onto lips, comes in a variety of flattering shades and delivers sheer coverage.

Pamper your pout with J.R. Watkins Natural Lip Tints, featuring all the benefits of a beeswax lip balm with the added bonus of a hint of colour. Keep your lips primed with four fabulous shades to fit any mood.

After Bibi and Barack: depends whom you ask

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

Not even 24 hours had passed and the Obama-Netanyahu summit was assuming Rashomon-type qualities, with partisans reading their own fears and beliefs into the encounter.

The Rashomon phenomenon, by which observers of an event can produce substantially different but equally plausible accounts of it, is especially pronounced among Jewish groups: Americans for Peace Now praised President Barack Obama for saying he would "aggressively" pursue peace and calling for a stop to settlements, and its sister dovish group, Brit Tzedek v'Shalom, said it was relieved to see an end to what it called the Bush administration's "ruinous," hands-off approach.

At the other end of the spectrum, StandWithUs, which promotes hard-line, pro-Israel views on U.S. campuses and is behind a campaign urging Obama not to pressure Israel, said its take from the summit was that it was "about terrorism and not territories."

In the establishment centre, the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Defamation League released statements praising the leaders for reaffirming the "special relationship" between Israel and the United States.

Opinions

The centrist groups, dedicated to bridging both nations, are deeply invested in the notion of smooth sailing, but it might yet prove to be wishful thinking.

Netanyahu secured a significant agreement from Obama to review his Iran outreach policy by the end of the year, but substantial differences emerged over the urgency of advancing talks with the Palestinians.

The Israeli media, which closely monitor the relationship between Israeli prime ministers and U.S. presidents, was blunt. "Agreed not to agree" and "Disagreements and smiles" headlined the mass circulation Yediot Achronot. "Disagreements" and "With mixed feelings" echoed its competitor Ma'ariv.

The negative coverage infuriated Netanyahu and his aides, who fear nothing more than a repeat of the disastrous first months of his 1996-99 prime ministership, when he alienated then-president Bill Clinton by cultivating Clinton's political enemies. That approach helped doom Netanyahu's electoral chances three years later.

Netanyahu convened a last-minute news conference on Capitol Hill last week following his meetings with leaders of the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives. Staffers for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi scrambled to find a room for Netanyahu and watched nervously as Israeli reporters jostled one another.

The Israeli leader sauntered in and said he would take no questions.

"I had important conversations with President Obama," Netanyahu said. "The central understanding with President Obama is important to the State of Israel, and that is that Israel and the United States agree eye to eye that Iran must be not be allowed to develop a military nuclear capability. The president made clear that he would take all steps to ensure this outcome. I think that this is a message that is important to us."

The effect was to suggest that the Israeli media were incorrect to emphasize differences over how to deal with the Palestinians: Iran was the "central understanding," it was "important to the State of Israel" and that was the "message that is important to us." Speaking in Hebrew, he stressed the "us."

Talking with the Palestinians, Netanyahu said, was the "second thing," although he noted that he was prepared to "restart the process with the Palestinians immediately." Again, the prime minister said he was pleased with Obama's insistence that neighbouring Arab states make substantive contributions toward reconciliation – "not at the end of the process, but at the outset."

Israel's military option quashed

By YOSSI MELMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Israel's military option against Iran has died. The death warrant was issued by the new U.S. administration led by President Barack Obama.

The administration's senior officials, from the president to Vice-President Joe Biden, Defence Secretary Robert Gates and others, are sending strong, clear hints that Israel does not have permission to strike Iran. Yet, given their familiarity with the Israeli client, they have not made do with simple hints and intimations. Washington dispatched the new CIA director, Leon Panetta, to Israel earlier this month. Panetta made clear to Netanyahu, in so many words, that an Israeli attack would create "big trouble."

At one point perhaps, Israel had just a small window of opportunity to exercise the military option – the possibility of attacking sites in Iran to prevent it from developing nuclear weapons. This is assuming, of course, that Israel indeed has the military capability to carry out such a mission, an assumption that raises many questions.

This is a mission that requires gathering pinpoint intelligence to identify the precise targets without harming thousands of innocent civilians. One of the targets of such a strike would be the uranium enrichment facility in Isfahan, which lies in the heart of a congested civilian population.

A realistic military option is also contingent on fighter jets finding undetected routes, as well as carrying a sufficient payload of bombs and missiles to inflict heavy damage on the targets.

Assuming that Israel does, indeed, have a military capability that would enable it to strike at the targets, inflict heavy damage and set Iran's nuclear program back a few years, the opportunity to realize this capability arguably presented itself to Israel a few years ago. At the time, Iran was subject to an intense international offensive. Inspectors of the International Atomic Energy Agency repeatedly exposed its lies and levied sanctions against the Tehran regime.

But all this is now in the past. The sanctions are stuck. Ahmadinejad has, for the time being, softened his bellicose rhetoric. The production of Iranian missiles has doubled.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is not ready to recognize the right of the Palestinians to a state of their own, nor does he have any intention of holding serious negotiations with Syria on withdrawal from the Golan Heights. This position reduces international support for Israel.

But most importantly, there is a new president in Washington, one who has outlined a new policy vis-a-vis Iran. Obama has announced the start of negotiations with Iran, and even though he mentioned that the talks will have to be concluded by the end of this year, he did not set a clear deadline.

The supreme tenet of Israeli defence policy states that Jerusalem must not launch any strategic initiative that stands in contradiction to or harms the clear interests of the United States. This stance has underpinned every fateful decision taken by Israel relating to matters of war and peace.

If this tenet remains the cornerstone of defence policy, then again, Israel will not act against the explicit wishes of the United States.

Impact of Iranian nuke

Some 23 per cent of Israelis would consider leaving the country if Iran obtains a nuclear weapon, according to a poll conducted on behalf of the Center for Iranian Studies at Tel Aviv University. Some 85 per cent of respondents said they feared the Islamic Republic would obtain an atomic bomb, 57 per cent believed the new U.S. initiative to engage in dialogue with Tehran would fail, and 41 per cent believed Israel should strike Iran's nuclear installations without waiting to see whether or how the talks develop. "The findings are worrying because they reflect an exaggerated and unnecessary fear," David Menashri, the head of the centre, said. "Iran's leadership is religiously extremist but calculated, and it understands an unconventional attack on Israel is an act of madness that will destroy Iran."

Supreme Court questions conversion decisions

Israel's Supreme Court has ordered the High Rabbinic Court to explain why it nullified conversions by the former National Conversion Authority chief. The move to cancel hundreds of conversions overseen by special conversion courts headed by Rabbi Haim Druckman came in February 2008, when a religious court judge in Ashdod retroactively annulled the conversion of a woman whom Druckman had converted 17 years earlier. The annulment also affected the Jewish status of the woman's four children. The Supreme Court ruling came after a petition was filed by several organizations and two women whose conversions were affected. The petition asked the Court to order Israel's rabbinic courts to recognize all conversions registered by the National Conversion Authority. The rabbinic court has 90 days to respond. The woman and other converts in her position remain registered as Jews with the Interior Ministry, but the rabbinic court wields the power to refuse to marry them.

Argentine shuls get bomb threats

JTA

BUENOS AIRES — Two Buenos Aires synagogues last week received bomb threats in the wake of violent anti-Semitic attacks at a public street celebration.

The bomb threats on the Amaijai and New Israeli Community synagogues, both located in the highly Jewish neighbourhood of Belgrano, proved to be false alarms.

Late in the afternoon on May 17, shortly after Jewish families and their non-Jewish neighbours began Independence Day celebrations at a "Buenos Aires Celebrates" event, a group of some 20 people came out of a subway depot with anti-Semitic banners and signs and fighting broke out.

According to the organizers, a number of Jews were beaten and required medical attention, the news agency AFP reported.

"In the middle of the cultural festival, the group attacked with complete impunity," Aldo Donzis, the DAIA Jewish local political umbrella institution president, told JTA. "Five police officers who were standing in a corner took a long time before acting. Two people from the public were hurt as well as a policeman. Many of the aggressors ran away, but five of them were caught by the policemen and others from the public who chased them."

DAIA officials said the group will take legal action against the five aggressors.

"It was really a very violent act," said Donzis.

The Israeli festival, held a block away from the central Plaza de Mayo, is part of a series of events "celebrating Buenos Aires' diversity and the pluralism that builds our identity," Claudio Avruj, the head of the city's Institutional Relations General Direction office, told JTA. A Greek festival was held in March and a Russian celebration is planned for June.

"People stayed and redoubled the will to celebrate," said Avruj

In related developments, Argentine investigators discovered arms, bombs and flags with political insignia at a site where suspects in an anti-Semitic attack held meetings.

Located in Florencio Varela, in the southern outskirts of Buenos Aires, the centre was headquarters for the Front for Revolutionary Action, a group related to the five people arrested after the violent anti-Semitic attacks at the public celebration to mark the 61st anniversary of Israel's founding. The flags also bore the face of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, who has been deeply critical of Israel in recent months.

CANADIAN FRIENDS OF PEACE NOW presents

Colonel [RETIRED] Shaul Arieli

Former Commander of the Northern Brigade, IDF in Gaza, Director of the Council for Peace and Security, speaking on:

Israel's New Government and Prospects for Peace

Colonel Arieli has had a distinguished career as a military officer and played an important role as a peace campaigner. In the IDF, he served in commanding posts in the Paratroopers Unit, was the Commander of the Northern Brigade in Gaza (at the level of Colonel), and was responsible for the evacuation of the Gaza Strip in 1994. As part of his military service, he was responsible for the preparation of negotiations with the Palestinians, serving as head of the Interim Agreement Administration under the Rabin government, and head of the Peace Administration under the Barak Government. Since retiring from the IDF in 2001, Colonel Arieli has been dedicated to advancing an Israeli-Palestinian final-status agreement, and was among the lead negotiators of the Geneva Initiative in 2003. He is currently a Fellow and Senior researcher at the Economic Cooperation Foundation, and is a Board member of Israel's Council for Peace and Security.

Atlantis astronaut carried mezuzah

JTA

JERUSALEM — One of the astronauts on the space shuttle Atlantis carried a mezuzah with him to honour the life of the first Israeli astronaut.

Mission specialist Mike Massimino, who conducted repairs to the Hubble telescope, took a replica of the Barbed Wire Mezuzah by San Francisco artist Aimee Golant with him into space to honour Ilan Ramon, who carried the original mezuzah in the space shuttle Columbia. Ramon and the entire crew were killed in the Columbia disaster in 2003.

The original mezuzah was commissioned by The 1939 Club, a group of Holocaust survivors and their families in Los Angeles. After the Columbia tragedy, the 1939 Club commissioned Golant to make another Barbed Wire Mezuzah to give to Ramon's widow, Rona, as a gift. Rona Ramon asked the artist to make the third mezuzah for Massimino to take into space, according to the artist's blog.

Canada committed to peace process

Canada was the first country to announce its boycott of the meeting, even ahead of Israel.

Before coming to Israel, Kenney visited Lebanon, Syria and Egypt, since Canada is home to many immigrants from these countries, he said. After arriving in Israel last Thursday, he visited a Jewish Agency absorption centre in Mevasseret Zion, outside Jerusalem, and met with his Israeli counterpart, Immigration Minister Sofa Landver. (See photo page 4.)

He also spoke to Minority Affairs Minister Avishay Braverman and Information and Diaspora Minister Yuli Edelstein, who is also the former chairman of the interparliamentary Canada-Israel Friendship Group.

In a statement issued last week, Harper said that he was looking forward to hosting Abbas "and discussing the current peace process and the important security and economic issues that face the Palestinian Authority. We continue to work in good faith with President Abbas, whom the government of Canada recognizes as a legitimate representative of Palestinian interests in the wider Middle East."

He added that "Canada is committed to the peace process" and continues "to support regional leaders who share our commitment to the principles of non-violence, recognition of the State of Israel, and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations."

By ERIC FINGERHUT
JTA

WASHINGTON — The arrest of four men accused of plotting to attack two Bronx synagogues underscores the threat to Jewish targets by individuals or small groups, several experts said.

From the shooting at a Los Angeles Jewish community centre 10 years ago through the attack on the Seattle Jewish federation building in 2006, to the individual targeting Jews at Wesleyan University in Connecticut this month, an individual or small group not formally connected with Al Qaeda or any major international terrorist group was at the centre of the threat.

Steve Pomerantz, former assistant director and director of counterterrorism at the FBI, said that last week's arrests show that "all you need to know about terrorism you can learn from this case." He added that Jews will always top the list of targets for terrorists and that groups unaffiliated with a large international terror group are "at least as dangerous" as well-known groups such as Al Qaeda, because they can "more easily slip through the intelligence net."

Paul Goldenberg, executive director of the Jewish-organized Secure Community Network, stressed "one common denominator" in all those past plots: hostile surveillance by the attackers.

"They were methodical enough and premeditated enough to plan and study the target," said Goldenberg, whose organization was established 3-1/2 years ago by the United Jewish Communities and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations to co-ordinate and advise on security in the Jewish community.

For example, the criminal complaint in the New York plot states that last month, one of the defendants "photographed several synagogues and Jewish community centres in the Bronx and elsewhere for consideration as possible targets in a planned terrorist bombing campaign" and said bombing a JCC would be a "piece of cake."

'They stated they wanted to make jihad'

That's why employees and others at Jewish institutions need to be "extremely cognizant" of what's going on around their facilities, Goldenberg said, because people could be watching buildings, studying entry and exit patterns, and times security guards patrol surroundings.

"If people are acting nervous in a location where they shouldn't be, say something," Goldenberg said, adding that while most institutions have video surveillance, personnel must be trained to spot potential dangers.

The four men "wanted to commit jihad," New York Police commissioner Raymond Kelly said. James Cromitie, David Williams, Onta Williams and Laguerre Payen also wanted to shoot down military planes, reports said.

The four men, all of Newburgh 60 miles north of New York, were arrested last Wednesday night. Payen is a native of Haiti. All four are Muslims, and three are reportedly recent converts to Islam.

"More information about their motives I'm sure will be developed as the case progresses, but right now they stated they wanted to make jihad. They were disturbed about what was happening in Afghanistan and Pakistan, that Muslims were being killed," Kelly said. "They were making statements that Jews were killed in this attack and that would be all right – that sort of thing."

Kelly said the men weren't acting on behalf of any terror groups and described them as "petty criminals" with multiple arrests for minor crimes.

According to the U.S. Attorney's statement, an informant working with the FBI this month provided the four men with a disabled anti-aircraft missile launcher and disabled explosives. The men planted the fake explosives, which they believed to be real, in cars parked outside the Riverdale Temple, a Reform synagogue, and the Riverdale Jewish Center, an Orthodox shul.

The first meeting between the informer and Cromitie took place in June 2008 in a mosque in Newburgh.

"While the weapons provided to the defendants by the co-operating witness were fake, the defendants thought they were absolutely real," acting U.S. Attorney Lev Dassin said in the statement. "The defendants planned to strike military planes with surface-to-air guided missiles and to destroy a synagogue and a Jewish community centre with C-4 plastic explosives."

The plotters met in prison, similar to the four men arrested in Los Angeles in 2005 on charges of plotting terror attacks on Jewish and military targets.

The defendants are likely to argue in their defence that they really weren't that involved in the plot and that the government informant, who allegedly acquired the weapons for them, actually directed the operation.

Pomerantz said the fact the plot went as far as planting weapons – although inoperative – made it unlikely such a defence could succeed. "This is as good a case as you can have," he said.

Meanwhile, police said they're looking for a man caught on surveillance cameras trying to burn down a Miami Beach shul last week. The man, wearing a T-shirt and a backward ball cap, lit a pile of wood inside a garage at Temple Moses.

Also last week, two Buenos Aires synagogues received bomb threats in the wake of violent anti-Semitic attacks at a public street celebration, while Brazilian police said they thwarted a plan by neo-Nazis to bomb two shuls.

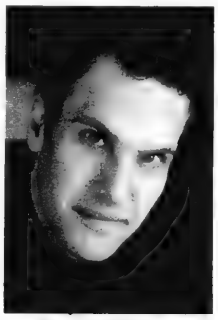
Concert honours Theodore Bikel and Srul Irving Glick

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Tenor Mitch Smolkin is thrilled to be featured at the upcoming Toronto Jewish Folk Choir's concert honouring Theodore Bikel's 85th birthday and commemorating the late composer Srul Irving Glick.



Mitch Smolkin

Smolkin has met and been influenced by both men.

"Bikel is a very powerful yet intimate performer. I saw him in Montreal and in Krakow. One of his most memorable performances was part of a project that brings together musicians from the former Yugoslavia. He has a huge social conscience, and that makes me proud to be a part of this," said Smolkin who recently returned from performing in Jerusalem.

At the concert to be held Sunday, May 31, at 3 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre, Smolkin will be the guest soloist in the tribute to Bikel, performing four songs with the choir: Bobbes Kholem, Mordechai Gebirtig's Reyzele and two arrangements by maestro Alexander Veprinsky – the humorous Purim song Hop mayne homentashn and Abraham Ellstein's Tif vi di nacht (Deep as the Night). Smolkin's solo set includes songs from his eclectic repertoire accompanied by pianist Nina Shapilsky.

Smolkin remembers meeting Glick at an awards dinner honouring the composer. "Something in his speech never left my memory. When he was asked to define what an artist is, Glick replied, 'Through their art, artists provide a perspective on the world that helps us understand our place in life.' I always found that powerful and inspiring."

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

When you think of folk music, Joan Baez or The Travellers are more likely to come to mind than a six-piece swing Yiddish band.

But, surpisingly, Toronto's Sisters of Sheynville won the vocal group of the year award at last summer's Canadian Folk Music Awards.

"It was a complete shock," said Lenka Lichtenberg, bandleader of Sisters of Sheynville, who are playing Hugh's Room in Toronto on June 3.

"I wasn't expecting to win at all, and I didn't see us being 'folk.' I did have a tingling in my stomach, but I never expected to win. It was a beautiful surprise."

The Sisters are Canada's only all-female swing/klezmer sextet. They formed four years ago, inspired by the Barry Sisters, an American Yiddish swing duo that was popular in the 1940s and '50s.

Lenka Lichtenberg

Recently, the group's sound has evolved to include more jazz and improvisation. "Fern Lindzon [the pianist and one of three singers] with her jazz background takes that sound to a totally different place and makes it our own," Lichtenberg says.

"We have a three-piece harmony, as opposed to the two-piece of the Barry Sisters," she adds.

The group sings in Yiddish and English and does traditional as well as original songs. "We have about five original songs, some in the style of early swing and others have more of a modern Jewish sound."

The sextet is made up of Lichtenberg, on vocals and tambourine; Lindzon; Isabel Fryszberg, on vocals; Kinneret Sagee, on clarinet; Rachel Melas, on double bass; and drummer Lorie Wolf.

"The group was Isabel's idea. She contacted me to create a band and do the music of the Barry Sisters," Lichtenberg says. "She felt it would be good to preserve the music and keep it alive. It was all new to me, as I grew up in Prague and American swing didn't mean anything to me. All six of us have grown musically through being in the band."

Over the past four years, the band has played major festivals in Canada and the U.S. and has received much critical praise. They released their debut CD, Sheynville Express, in 2007 and are planning on releasing another.

"We have about six or seven new songs since our last album, so when we have four or five more, we can go back to the studio."

The Sisters of Sheynville also play a monthly gig at Chalker's Pub on Marlee Avenue, and are booked at the Mariposa Folk Festival on July 5.

Lichtenberg is looking forward to appearing at the Festival of Jewish Culture's "Singer's Warsaw" (a tribute to writer I.B. Singer) in Poland this September.

Otto Preminger retrospective at Cinematheque Ontario

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Otto Preminger (1905-1986) was a larger-than-life, stereotypical Hollywood producer and director whose movies ranged from film noir mysteries and flamboyant melodramas to sweeping historical sagas and thoughtful courtroom dramas.

Preminger, whose credits include Exodus, Advise and Consent, Anatomy of a Murder, Bunny Lake is Missing and The Cardinal, will be the subject of a Cinematheque Ontario retrospective. Fallen Angels: The Films of Otto Preminger will run from May 29 to July 2.

The films are to be screened at the Jackman Hall in the Art Gallery of Ontario. For more information, visit www.cinemathequeontario.ca.

He was born in Wiznitz, near Czernowitz, in what was then the Austro-Hungarian Empire and is now Ukraine. Preminger's father, Markus, the son of a talmudic scholar, was a public prosecutor, a position to which few Jews could aspire unless they converted to Christianity.

The prewar anti-Semitism in Austria influenced him, and as a filmmaker, he later explored this topic in The Cardinal (1963), which was set in Rome, Vienna and Boston, and starred Romy Schneider and Carol Lynley. In Daisy Kenyon (1947), starring Joan Crawford and Henry Fonda, he examined racial intolerance.

Thanks to his father, he witnessed court cases and trials, and these experiences had a lasting influence on him, too. Anatomy of a Murder (1959), an accomplished and ambiguous courtroom drama, features James Stewart as a small-town lawyer hired to defend a U.S. army lieutenant (Ben Gazzara) charged with the murder of a bar owner who allegedly raped his wife (Lee Remick).

To satisfy his father, Preminger studied law at the University of Vienna while employed as an apprentice to legendary theatre director Max Reinhardt. The German expressionism that generally informed Reinhardt's style appeared, to some degree, in at least two Preminger films.

In The Man with the Golden Arm (1955), celebrated for Elmer Bernstein's jazz score, Frank Sinatra portrays a drug addict who seeks a fresh start as as drummer. And in Where the Sidewalk Ends (1950), boasting Ben Hecht's hardboiled dialogue and Joseph LaShelle's moody cinematography, Dana Andrews plays a hard-as-nails New York cop consumed by shame.

Under Reinhardt's tutelage, Preminger established himself as a theatre director. Among the performers he hired was Louise Rainer, an actress who won back-to-back Academy Awards in 1936 and 1937 for the Great Zeigfeld and The Good Earth.

In 1935, Preminger's life changed irretrievably when Joseph Schenck, the founder of the Twentieth Century Fox studio, offered him a gig in Hollywood. Danger – Love at Work (1937), a B-picture comedy with Ann Sothern, was the first film Preminger directed in the United States.

Schenck's partner, Darryl Zanuck, handed Preminger his second assignment, Kidnapped (1938), based on a Robert Louis Stevenson novel and set in the Scottish highlands. During the shooting, Preminger flew into his first tantrum, a template for his less than civilized behaviour in future films.

He acquired a reputation for verbally abusing and bullying actors and bursting oversize egos, though he could be unusually empathetic and kind in certain instances.

Otto Preminger

Kidnapped also marked a new phase in his career. He and Zanuck clashed over the interpretation of Zanuck's script, with the net result that Preminger was fired. Now unemployed, he returned to his first love, the theatre.

After he had a series of successes on Broadway, Hollywood came knocking again, asking him to reprise a play, Margin for Error, for the screen. Margin for Error (1943) stars Milton Berle as a Jewish policeman in New York City whose task is to protect an imperious German diplomat, depicted by Preminger himself, and to arrest Nazi saboteurs threatening the Big Apple.

Impressed by Preminger's performance, Samuel Goldwyn hired him as a Nazi in a Bob Hope comedy, They Got Me Covered. Years later, he would appear as a Nazi yet again in Billy Wilder's Stalag 17 (1953).

Preminger's pièce de résistance in film noir was probably Laura (1944), which critic Pauline Kael described as "everybody's favourite chic murder mystery." The movie, starring Gene Tierny, Clifton Webb, Dana Andrews and Vincent Price, earned Preminger his first of two Academy Award nominations for best director.

His next film, Fallen Angels (1945), with Dana Andrews and Linda Darnell, was a tale of deceit and murder in which a con man seduces a sultry waitress and an affluent spinster.

Forever Amber (1947), which Preminger complained was his most expensive yet worst film, was a lavishly mounted period piece that unfolds in 17th-century Britain.

The 1950s and 1960s were fruitful years for Preminger. He directed, among other films, Porgy and Bess (1959), adapted from George Gershwin's opera; Exodus (1960), based on Leon Uris' bestselling novel on the founding of Israel; and Advise and Consent (1962), a political thriller set in Washington, D.C. and one of the first mainstream American movies to touch directly on homosexuality.

In line with his unconventional approach, Preminger made Hurry Sundown (1967), a drama in which Michael Caine was cast as a southern patriarch. It was supposed to break racial and sexual taboos, but was panned instead, signalling a decline in Preminger's artistic sensibility. Preminger's final six films, including Skidoo (1968) and The Human Factor (1979), were failures as well.

Smolkin influenced by both men

The choir's performances will include Glick's Time Cycle (Yiddish Suite No. 2), with words by the Toronto Yiddish poet Peretz Miransky (1908-1993), as well as A Glezele Lechaim (A Glass of Cheer), Lo Yisa Goy (Nation shall not lift up arms against nation) and Sephardi songs La Rosa Enflorece (The Rose Blooms) and Adio Querida (Farewell, Beloved).

Veprinsky will conduct the 30-member choir with solos by soprano Miriam Eskin and bass Herman Rombouts, accompanied by pianist Lina Zemelman.

Actor and singer Theodore Bikel has appeared in concerts for more than 50 years in the United States, Canada, Israel, New Zealand and Australia. He is best known for his role as Tevya in Fiddler on the Roof, which he's played more often than any other actor – more than 2,000 times since 1967.

Glick was a prominent Canadian composer of chamber, oratorio, orchestral, vocal and choral music. Born in Toronto, he was the classical music producer at the CBC for more than 24 years, choir director and composer in residence with Beth Tikvah Synagogue between 1969 and 2002, and taught at the Royal Conservatory of Music and York University. He was also the recipient of a Governor General's medal for his contribution to Canada's culture and was appointed a Member of the Order of Canada for outstanding achievement. He died in 2002.

Tickets for the Bikel/Glick tribute concert at Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St. – the choir's 83rd spring concert – are $20 in advance, $25 at the door; children 12 and under free. For ticket reservations, call 416-636-0936 or e-mail tjfolkchoir@sympatico.ca. For Visa orders, call 416-398-3405.

Smolkin will also give a special Father's Day concert on June 21 with Klezmer En Buenos Aires at the Glenn Gould Studio. In October, he will tour South America with the klezmer group.

For more information on Smolkin visit his website at www.mitchsmolkin.com.

Pop star Ivri Lider becomes a spokesperson for a 'new liberal movement' in Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Israeli pop star Ivri Lider, who has been referred to as the voice of a new Israeli generation, is coming to Toronto next month as part of a tour to promote his latest album.

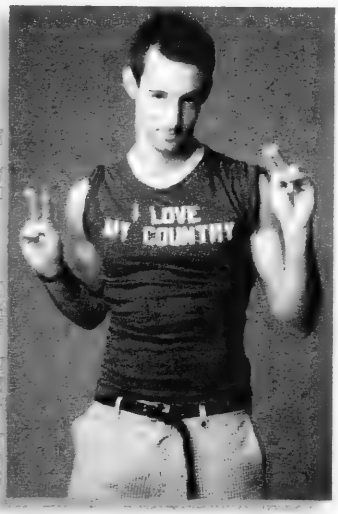
Tel Aviv DJ Assaf Amdursky is also set to hit the stage following Lider's performance.

Lider, who travelled to Spain to kick off his tour to promote his fifth album Be'ketzev Ahid Be'tnuot Shel Ha'goof, or The Steady Rhythm of Body Movements, spoke to The CJN about his upcoming show in Toronto, his music, and his personal life.

In his 12-year music career, since he released his first album Melatef V'meshaker (Caressing and Lying), Lider said he is always looking to evolve and reinvent himself.

"I think my music has definitely evolved. I'm trying to always look for new things and new sounds, and new things to do and I'm sure my lyrics changed with me. I like to write about personal stuff and stuff that happens to me, my views on the world," he said.



Ivri Lider will be in Toronto next week to perform at The Guvernment.

In 2002, when Lider released Ha'anashim Ha'chadashim, The New People, the album focused on an electronic sound.

"It had a lot of samples and sound design and stuff like that," he said.

"Ze Lo Oto Davar [It's Not the Same Thing] was very, very acoustic. It was mainly piano and string orchestra. No computers were involved except during recording."

But his latest album, with tracks both in English and Hebrew, combines both distinct sounds.

"I think this last album, it's kind of like a mixture of those two types of music I like doing and the band is very involved."

Lider, 35, has performed in Toronto twice before – most recently when he sang The Man I Love from the soundtrack of Eytan Fox's film, The Bubble, at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival in 2007.

Although he's achieved international success throughout his career, Lider has also inadvertently taken on a role as a spokesperson for a liberal-minded Israeli public.

Lider said he didn't seek out that role, but when he would write and speak about what was interesting and important to him, people seemed to relate to him.

"People started referring to me this way when I did The New People because it was very much about the new generation, the cities, the western world... It was even political in a way," Lider said.

"I think my coming out was part of it because I was the only one and then it made me a bit of a spokesperson for a new liberal movement or idea."

He said his decision to be openly gay was based a combination of factors.

"On a personal note, it's just me wanting to be true and up front and not have any secrets. As an artist, I think it's important to be able to write about everything I want to in a very free way," he said.

With tracks off his latest album, such as Jesse, Lider doesn't shy away from exploring the insecurities and confusion that some experience when coming to terms with their sexuality.

"I loved a boy named Jesse/ But Jesse doesn't love me back/ He says he's straight and all that stuff is only in my mind," he sings.

Lider said that having a profession that puts him in the public eye and grants him a world stage makes him feel like he has an obligation to speak for the voiceless.

"It's kind of maybe my duty in a way, because as an artist I have the privilege to get a lot of love from people and respect and it's my way of giving back something to the world and society," he said.

"If I can do something to help other people who are in a bad place or if I can help move some ideas forward, and I can do that because [of my status], then it is kind of my obligation to do that."

He said that in Israel, the acceptance of homosexuality is progressing.

"It's funny because of on one hand Israel is liberal and, on the other, it's not. For example, in Israel, in the army, it is not something that would ever be an excuse not to be in the army, whereas in America, it's like, 'Don't ask, don't tell,'" Lider said.

"So ih some ways, Israel is very liberal and you can be out and be successful, but sometimes, on the other hand of course, you can have some religious guy or a government official saying some horrible stuff."

But, he added, a country like Canada, where homosexuals are free to marry one another, is far more progressive.

"A lot of Israelis go to marry in Canada. Actually, two of my best friends, two girls, were married in Toronto two years ago and last year they moved there."

When asked if he would ever consider getting married in Toronto, he said, "Well, if I can find someone to marry, yeah."

Lider said that with his fame comes an obligation to use his influence to speak out and "move some ideas forward."

Amos Oz's new novel of story-making and its discontents

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

When Amos Oz's recent novel appeared in English translation, his homeland was in the midst of celebrating his 70th birthday with a three-day festival in his hometown of Arad and a conference at Ben-Gurion University.

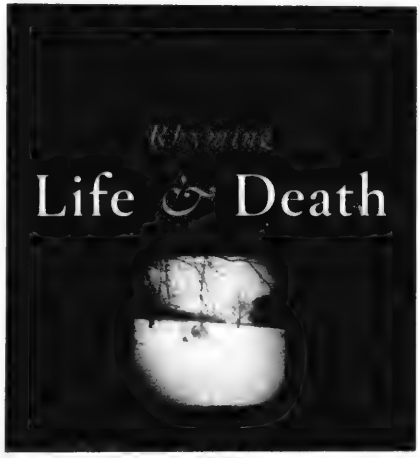
Oz's political views have often placed him on the fringes of the Israeli mainstream, but he shares this position with other major Israeli novelists such as David Grossman and A.B. Yehoshua. Rhyming Life & Death (Houghton Mifflin Harcourt), which appeared in Hebrew two years ago, is a slim book, easily read in a sitting or two. Its focus is the imaginings, during an eight-hour period, of a writer said to be in his early 40s. But for such a young narrator, the story told has an inescapable tone of gloom, of end times, of a writerly voice with grave doubts about its relevance and motivations.

Norman Ravin

Set in the early 1980s, the book turns on the kind of event that writers love to hate – the all-too-necessary question-and-answer event meant to introduce a new book, which often leads to the kind of questions with which Oz begins his narrative: "Why do you write? Why do you write the way you do? Are you trying to influence your readers, and, if so, how?" Oz's protagonist, known simply as "the Author," has "no idea how he will answer the audience's questions."

The ingenious feature that drives the front half of Rhyming Life & Death is the Author's spontaneous ability to develop full-fledged characters – complete with flaws, personal entanglements and a deeply textured daily life – from fleeting encounters. On his way to an event in his honour at the Shunia Shor and the Seven Victims of the Quarry Attack Cultural Center in Tel Aviv, he stops at a coffee shop. There, out of an overheard conversation, he conjures Ovadya Hazzam, a lottery winner who "spent money left and right, both on good causes and just having a good time, he cruised around town all day in a blue Buick with Russian blondes…" Later, as the Author listens to a literary critic summarize his contribution to Israeli literature, he spots a face to which he attaches the name Arnold Bartok: "He lives with his mother, Ophelia, whose legs are paralyzed. The two of them sleep under the same sheet on a worn-out mattress in their room, which is no more than a windowless cubicle that was once his father's little laundry."

This process of conjuration, which the Author calls his "usual tricks," gives Rhyming Life & Death its energy, and it allows Oz to supply glancing, sharply etched portraits of Israeli types and daily life. Political complaints, youthful artistic yearnings, embarrassed romantic urges and a wanton lust for life arise out of a bare motif: Hazzam's blue Buick and his blondes; a young waitress' "high" breasts; the way a "heavily built woman" listens attentively to the Author's words, "her lips… parted with the sweetness of the cultural experience she is undergoing."



There is great readerly pleasure in Oz's employment of these tricks, which offer a study in how a writerly imagination builds a fictional world out of the events of daily life. In this, Rhyming Life & Death is a book about writing, its pleasures and eccentricities, which answers some of the questions posed at the outset of the novel. In a recent interview in Ha'aretz, Oz outlined some of the basic habits that underwrite his creative work: "I get up at 5 in the morning, every day. This habit from the kibbutz has stayed with me. I go out to walk a little in the desert near the house in Arad, not long, 20 minutes. By 6, I'm already sitting at my desk and I write until noon. I always write with a pen . . . for sensual reasons, the arc between the pen and fingers…"

Further on the theme of a writer's motivations, Rhyming Life & Death takes its title from the book of the early Israeli poet Tsefania Beit-Halachmi. A touchstone in the Author's youth, Halachmi's poetry was sung to "melancholy Russian-style" tunes "around campfires and on kibbutz lawns." His subjects were "absorption of immigrants, transit camps, austerity measures, the conquest of the desert… border incidents and raids by infiltrators, the corruption and bureaucracy that overshadowed the public life of the young State. He represented the younger generation, the muscular, suntanned native-born sabras." These experiences encapsulate Oz's own youthful years, born as he was before the declaration of the State, to become, in the early 1960s, an emblematic figure from this "younger generation." At the novel's end, Oz's musings about Halachmi's fate seem to suggest his own doubts and indifference regarding his literary legacy.

Rhyming Life & Death takes an odd turn in its middle pages, as the Author describes (or imagines) a long, awkward scene of lovemaking with one of his admirers. Beyond this, it is a shrewd and unsettling portrait of an author's life and times.

Shermers bring brother act to Maccabiah volleyball

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

None of them actually mention winning a medal, but for three volleyball-playing brothers, at the end of the day, the upcoming Maccabiah Games promise to be an experience to cherish.

Elie, Daniel and Joshua Shermer will all suit up for the Canadian team in a competition that is usually dominated by the host Israelis, along with the United States and Brazil.

But as the Shermers describe it, just being in Israel, at the Maccabiah Games, walking into a stadium filled with 40,000 fans, meeting Jewish athletes from more than 50 countries, and doing that with your brothers at your side promises to be a great experience.

Elie, at 29 the oldest brother and the senior player on the Canadian team, believes they are the first brother trio to participate in the same games on the same team. Even if not, he's happy he was able to stick around until his youngest brother, Joshua, 19, got old enough and good enough to make the team.

"It's pretty amazing," he said last week. "It's probably the biggest motivating factor for going again."

For Elie, the upcoming 18th Maccabiah Games, which run from July 12 to 23, will be his third "Jewish Olympics." Both he and middle brother, Daniel, 26, competed at the 2005 and 2001 Games.

"I told [Joshua] to be prepared for the experience of a lifetime," Elie said. "We're a sports family that watched the Olympics. I say, 'Imagine walking in front of 40,000 people, representing your country. That experience will be amazing and we'll be doing it together.'"

What happens on the court seems almost secondary, but coach Brenda Willis is hoping to keep the players on a medal track. She'll be looking to the two older Shermer brothers to add stability and experience to the mostly young roster, since it's easy for a young team to be overwhelmed by the international experience.

The Shermers have been through it, she said, adding that "I don't expect anything at the Games will fase them."

A few months ago, "I had very high expectations, before the elite [Canadian] programs invaded our roster," Willis said.

She was referring to four players who made the Maccabiah team, but who will be unavailable because of other commitments.

Josh Binstock, who played at the last Maccabiah Games, is now on the Canadian national beach team and will be playing internationally this summer. Sam Schacter, who was an all-Canadian rookie playing for Wilfred Laurier, has been named to the Canadian national junior beach team and is committed to participating in the national development program.

Jesse Mighton, who played for Queen's and Dalhousie, is out due to a back injury.

The Maccabiah team is holding a roster spot open for him, but even if he comes, Canada will have a smaller roster than other competitors, both in numbers and in stature.

Willis, a Toronto native who is the head coach of the men's volleyball team at Queen's University, said because the Maccabiah team is small, "we need to be good at ball control."

In addition to the Shermers, she's relying on Daniel Levy, who played at York University, and Ron Appel, a former University of Toronto player, for stability. Kyle Done, who will play for British Columbia in the upcoming Canada Games, is going to be the team's libero, a defensive specialist.

Willis said Jewish volleyball talent in Canada is pretty deep. As to the absence of top players, "One person's struggle is another's opportunity," she said.

For Daniel Shermer, his passion for the game got him at age 18 to a provincial title playing with Loyalist College in 2001-02 and a third-place finish nationally. Three years later, at Humber College, he won another provincial title but settled for fourth place nationally.

His position is "setter, like the quarterback or point guard, the guy who runs the offense and controls what happens on the court," he said.

It's something his volleyball-playing dad, George, taught him and his brothers. George, who played for Maccabi Canada as a young man and who coached the 1997 team, said all three of his sons can play as setters or liberos.

Most important, though, is how "proud I am that they're looking forward to enjoying their Jewish experience. They're talking about how important it is for the three brothers to be playing in Israel and how proud as Jews they are to be experiencing the Games."

Joshua said that "from the pictures I've seen and the stories I've heard, I'm more excited about the Maccabiah experience than the competition itself."

The Games will mark the first time the three brothers play together in a tournament. They do play and practise together at Beach Blast, the volleyball facility operated by their dad, but to play on the same team, "that's very exciting," said Joshua. "That's the whole appeal of it."

Dubai fined for barring Israeli tennis player

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Dubai Tennis Championships will pay a record fine over the United Arab Emirates' (UAE) refusal to award a visa to an Israeli player.

The heads of the tournament agreed recently to pay a record $300,000 (US) fine after the World Tennis Association (WTA) turned down Dubai's appeal.

The UAE, which consists of Dubai and six other emirates, rejected Israeli tennis champion Shahar Peer's request for a visa just days before the start of the tournament and shortly before she planned to travel to the UAE in February.

The WTA also will require organizers of the Dubai tournament to ensure Israeli players who qualify for the event receive their visas at least eight weeks ahead of the 2010 event.

Partition of Jerusalem guarantees chaos

By NADAV SHRAGAI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Opinion

A great joy befell us in 1967, when we realized a 2,000-year-old dream and returned to our holiest sites, to historic Jerusalem.

The 200,000 Jews whom the State of Israel has settled in parts of Jerusalem that lie on the other side of its former border are not an obstacle to peace, but an obstacle to partition. And partition is the greatest guarantee of a chaos that would keep peace at bay for several more generations.

Muslims today question our right and our primacy in Jerusalem and rewrite the history of the city. They alter its events, place later events earlier and de-Judaize it. If the efforts to return Jews to the City of David and to parts of the Old City other than the Jewish Quarter succeed, it prevents partition and it will also do historic justice for the Jewish people.

Under Israeli rule, the Temple Mount – the Jewish people's holiest site, but only the third most important to Muslims – has become a place where any Jewish presence is viewed as problematic. This view is not merely anti-Jewish – which is particularly egregious given that there is no place more Jewish in the entire world – but it also violates the spirit of the law, which promises freedom of access to the holy places.

Moshe Dayan, the father of this policy, erred in reading the map in 1967. The former mufti, Sheikh Saad al-Din Alami, related before his death that he and his colleagues in the Muslim religious establishment, whose reaction Dayan so feared, had actually expected an arrangement such as the one instituted at the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron. They were psychologically prepared to have Jews, too, on a site on the mount for prayer. Now it is hard to change the status quo. But at least the little that was left to Jews on the mount – the right to visit it – ought to be upheld.

Israel makes both a moral and a tactical mistake when it discriminates against the Arab population of east Jerusalem with regard to infrastructure and services, thereby creating intolerable gaps between the city's Jewish and Arab populations. It cannot grasp the stick at both ends by simultaneously claiming sovereignty over all of Jerusalem and treating such a significant portion of its population as excess baggage. Nevertheless, if you talk to east Jerusalem residents, you will discover that a great many of them view the prospect of becoming part of the Palestinian Authority as a nightmare scenario.

The West Bank separation fence, which is the most significant change Jerusalem has undergone in recent years, improves security in the short term, but inflicts a great deal of long-term damage. It raises the wall of hatred and suspicion even higher and also encourages Palestinian migration – some 60,000 thus far – to the Israeli side of the fence, including to the city's Jewish neighbourhoods.

The greatest challenge the State of Israel and the Jerusalem municipality face today is to stem the huge exodus of Jews from the city. Some 17,000 Jews leave every year, because housing prices in Jerusalem are insane and there are no jobs. The solution, therefore, involves multiple elements: building apartments in the city, immediately and in large numbers; giving entrepreneurs grants and dirt-cheap land if they will create jobs in the city; and encouraging the growing trend of haredi Jews entering the city's workforce.

1 c quinoa
2 tsp grated lime zest
2 tblsp fresh lime juice
1 can black beans, rinsed and drained
2 medium tomatoes, diced
2 tblsp unsalted butter, melted and cooled
1/4 c chopped fresh cilantro
1 tsp sugar
1 tblsp vegetable oil
4 scallions, chopped

Dressing: Whisk together lime zest & juice, butter, oil, sugar, 1/2 tsp. salt, 1/4tsp pepper in a large bowl. Set aside.

Prepare quinoa as directed on box. When cooked, drain and let stand, still covered for about 5 min. Add quinoa to dressing and toss until dressing is absorbed, then stir in remaining ingredients and salt and pepper to taste.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

I am facing an extremely embarrassing situation. Noah and I were married in February – it was a fairy tale wedding.

When we got back from our honeymoon, we went through the generous gifts and cheques we had received. A few days after depositing the cheques, we were notified by the bank that one of the cheques had come back NSF, and we were charged a fee. It was from Noah's cousins, whom we are not very close with. We only see them at family functions. Noah was really angry and immediately called his mother who refused to get involved. I was more embarrassed than angry. I'm sure they didn't mean for this to happen. I would rather ignore the whole thing and simply not send them a thank-you card and be done with it. What do you think we should do?

Rubber Wedding Gift
Dear Rubber Wedding Gift

After mentioning this to a few people, I was a little surprised to hear how common it is. I would be inclined to give the cousins the benefit of the doubt. If they didn't want to give you a gift, it would have been much easier to give you nothing rather than a cheque that bounced.

I agree with you – leave it alone. It won't be long before someone in that household has to balance the chequing account and see the fee for an NSF cheque. You can be sure it will be a huge embarrassment for them without your making them feel worse.

My guess is you will get a replacement cheque with a note or phone call of apology. I would definitely hold off on sending the thank-you card until you hear some kind of acknowledgement for this unfortunate mistake. People are human, and not everyone is great at balancing cheque books.

If you never hear from them about this incident, then you have a choice to make. Either you continue to ignore it – but I know it will be eating away at Noah and he won't be able to be in the same place with his cousin without this big elephant in the room – or one of you can make a call and let them know. There is no easy way to approach this call. It is awkward for both you and the cousin, but at least this way, you deal with the incident and you can put it behind you and move on.

Pursue your dreams now, says Deepak Chopra

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

Many years ago, when I read Deepak Chopra's The Seven Spiritual Laws of Success: A Practical Guide to the Fulfillment of Your Dreams, I was hooked by the author's wisdom.

Chopra has been hailed by Time magazine as "one of the top heroes and icons of this century." He is the author of more than 42 books and is known for his groundbreaking lectures and miraculous work that bridge the gap between the West and the East, and help to bring the body, mind and soul back into balance.

When I heard he was going to be appearing in Toronto at Roy Thomson Hall, I was thrilled to finally have the opportunity to hear him speak.

As he stood before the audience of 2,500 people, he began by asking, "So, how's everyone?" An enthusiastic audience member called out, "How about you?" He answered with a smile, and very little ego, "I'm good." And then he got right into it by saying, "We are the ones we've been waiting for."

The topic was the "Secret of Enlightenment," and Chopra provided many practical tools for people to consider in their leap toward enlightened living. This is a huge theme for Chopra, and indeed he has covered this theme in many of his books, including How To Know God: The Soul's Journey into the Mystery of Mysteries and Why is God Laughing: The Path to Spiritual Optimism, with a foreword by his friend, funnyman Mike Myers.

What was most inspiring throughout the evening is how Chopra was able to take almost 3,000 people in the audience and do a 15-minute meditation with them. He began by inviting everyone to close their eyes and meditate on the word gratitude, and then he asked the audience to think of what they really wanted. Finally, he asked everyone to keep their eyes closed for 15 minutes and say the words, "I am," silently to themselves. You could have heard a pin drop in the room.

It was very powerful, and there is the question that when you "came back to the room" after meditating, did you really feel de-stressed and rejuvenated. I say yes, I felt somewhat enlightened. Meditation will actually change your brain settings, according to Chopra, and he believes strongly in the value of meditation and asking the questions, "Who am I?"; "What's my purpose?"; "What's my contribution?" and "What are my unique talents?"

He talked about how "we are the ones we've been waiting for" and how the world is in you already; how we are all connected to one another; how your success is mine, too, and how all fulfilment really comes from within.

His happiness formula is brilliant. Essentially, it asks if you've been programmed to see opportunities or problems in every situation. When you see opportunities in everything, you will simply be happier. He also talks about how "the only time is now."

And that is what resonated the most. So many of us are waiting for that right moment to pursue our dreams, whether it's cleaning out the clutter for once and for all; losing that 10 pounds and living more healthfully; working out more; taking a step closer toward our purpose; changing the way we react, and living with more calm and peace. Whatever it is, Chopra wants us to know that the time is now to take that step or that leap toward our own enlightenment.

CJC gives Harper human rights award

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Stephen Harper has become the first prime minister to be awarded Canadian Jewish Congress' Saul Hayes Human Rights Award.

The award, given to an individual in Canada or abroad who has rendered distinguished service to the cause of human rights, was presented to the prime minister Sunday at the CJC's 29th plenary assembly at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto. The plenary marked the 90th anniversary of the organization's founding.

Mark Freiman

In accepting the award, Harper announced that his government will introduce legislation this week that will give victims of terror the right to seek compensation for their suffering. The government plans to amend the State Immunity Act to allow Canadians to seek redress in Canada against foreign individuals or governments for damages wrought by acts of terrorism.

Also at the event, Toronto lawyer and jurist, former deputy attorney general for Ontario and longtime community activist Mark Freiman, was installed as incoming CJC president.

> Former Ontario deputy attorney general chosen new Congress president

"I am truly honoured to have been asked to take on this important and challenging role," Freiman told the assembly. "There is much to do in advancing CJC's key advocacy initiatives. I hope that with the assistance and support of the officers, the board and the staff, I can make an appropriate contribution to this much-needed work over the next two years."

Explaining his approach to his new role, Freiman said that "advocacy starts with the assembly of information, and that requires effective listening. [Then] when you do speak, your voice is noted and your lesson is heard."

He said he intends to visit communities across the country. "Only then can we be assured that all diverse voices are listened to."

Harper said that although his government is not always of one mind with the government of Israel, he is troubled by those who use their opposition to Israel as a cover for anti-Semitic discourse.

Speaking in French and English, he said it is all too common for politicians to support Israel in forums like this, and then condemn the country and accuse it of war crimes when it defends itself.

Modern sandstorm of biblical proportions

An Israeli airplane two weeks ago was able to capture photos of a rare sandstorm blowing across the south of Israel in the Negev. Advancing from west to east at a speed of 60 km/h, the storm blew in from the Sinai Desert. The photo was taken from an altitude of 8,000 feet. The height of the wall of sand was approximately 4,000 feet. Bracing for the howl of sand is the community of Nevatim, southeast of Be'er Sheva. [Photo by Eliezer Yaffe]

The News in Brief

CANADA

Leader Arrested

MONTREAL — An ex-Quebec director of B'nai Brith Canada was arrested on child porn charges. Bill Surkis, 69, appeared in court May 29 after police allegedly found 23 suspicious videos on his computer, which he had taken in for a virus check. A repair shop employee alerted police. Surkis faces one count of accessing child pornography and another of possession. Surkis, also a former director of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, spent a night in jail before appearing in court. As a condition of bail, he must stay away from children under 18 without another adult present and is barred from the web unless for work. He is also barred from leaving the province. Surkis, who now works as a consultant, will return to court Sept. 24.

Greenspon Replaced

TORONTO — The Globe and Mail last week named its Report on Business (ROB) editor, John Stackhouse, as editor-in-chief, replacing Edward Greenspon, a Montreal native who had held the job since 2002. Greenspon previously served as the Globe's ROB editor and its politics editor, and as editor-in-chief, he presided over a redesign of the Globe's print and web editions. Publisher Phillip Crawley said Greenspon, 52, was stepping down, but he didn't give any reason for the change.

Dalfen Headed CRTC

OTTAWA — Montreal-born lawyer Charles Dalfen, who championed Canadian content as chair of the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission from 2002 to 2006, died May 26 of a heart attack at age 66. Dalfen headed the CRTC in 2004 when it approved the Arabic news channel Al-Jazeera for broadcast in Canada if cable and satellite carriers censored hate speech on it, but they said the cost would be prohibitive.

WORLD

High-tech Conference

LOS ANGELES — U.S. and Israeli high-tech executives and venture capitalists are attending a conference in Los Angeles this week designed to match Israeli inventiveness with U.S. marketing skills. The theme of the Israel Conference's all-day meeting June 4 is "Cool Business from the Shores of the Mediterranean to the Shores of the Pacific: Expanding Opportunities between Israel and California." Sessions will cover high-technology, clean technology, medical devices, consumer branding and entertainment media technology. Major firms such as Google and Microsoft have increased their presence in Israel in recent years.

Yogurt Mogul Dies

PARIS — The honorary chair and namesake of the Danone yogurt company has died. Daniel Carasso, who turned sweet yogurt into a household food staple, died May 17 at his Paris home at age 103. His father, Issac, created the yogurt in Barcelona in 1919 and reportedly named it after his son, whose nickname in Catalan was Danon.

Flu Shuts Yeshivas

NEW YORK — Four Brooklyn yeshivas closed temporarily due to the swine flu. The Flatbush-area schools remained closed last week and were to reopen after Shavuot. Magen David Yeshiva, Yeshiva Tiferes Yisroel, Masores Bais Yaakov and Yeshiva Shaarei Torah decided to shut down after finding high absentee rates were due to students having probable or confirmed swine flu cases.

Kensington Exhibit 'Postponed Indefinitely'

TORONTO — The exhibit each hand as they are called has been "postponed indefinitely" and won't be part of Luminato, the Toronto art festival said last week.

Last month, the Koffler Centre of the Arts said it was disassociating, but not pulling funding, from the interactive exhibit about the history of Toronto's Kensington Market after it said it learned the artist, Reena Katz, supports Israeli Apartheid Week. It gave the exhibit $20,000 and co-sponsored it with Luminato.

Baycrest, whose seniors were integral to the exhibit's interactive component, withdrew its support just before the scheduled opening date of May 20, Katz said.

Luminato and Koffler are no longer promoting it.

Katz, who calls herself an anti-Zionist Jew, has said Koffler officials knew of her political leanings before they agreed to sponsor her project, and were comfortable with it, because it had nothing to do with the Middle East.

It was to have run in Kensington Market until July 26.

Addiction services have expanded with recession

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Nine years ago, JACS (Jewish Addiction Community Services) started up with a hotline and a weekly meeting.

Today, the organization that deals with the suffering caused by drugs, alcohol and gambling in the Toronto Jewish community offers three meetings an evening, and sees between 400 and 500 people a week in the building that it owns on Sheppard Avenue West.

Zalman Goldman, managing director of JACS, said that since the group opened its doors in 2000 – he has been with the organization since 2001 – more than 6,000 families have turned to JACS for help. "We see an increase of about five to 10 per cent every month, and the number of people always rises when we've given a public talk. We now have two full-time staff members and several part-timers," he added.

He said that JACS holds meetings in Winnipeg, Montreal and Ottawa, too, and is looking at holding meetings in Vancouver. JACS is also in negotiations for centres in Richmond Hill/Thornhill and downtown Toronto.

The organization offer self-help groups and facilitated groups run by clinicians, and also does referrals and assessments, he said. "If someone is in trouble, we can support the entire family through the process. Our new logo is Saving Livings by Solving Addiction Problems, and we have a new website, www.solvingaddictionproblems.com.

"Everybody knows someone who is struggling, and we've opened up groups to friends and co-workers who need clinical advice. The 'concerned persons group' attracts from 20 to 40 people every week. It's bursting at the seams," Goldman said.

JACS has expanded tremendously throughout the recession, he said. "Our budget has doubled in the past two years, and most of the money comes from private donations and our three major fundraisers, a golf tournament, a spin-a-thon and a theatre evening."

Their first-ever retreat, held recently in a local hotel, was a big success, Goldman said.

"In times like these, people turn to drugs, alcohol and gambling. We see people of all ages – teens, young adults and adults."

He said they are always looking for volunteers – most volunteers are highly sensitive or directly affected by addictions – and there are a number of committees in which they can become involved. "We try to create a good fit for each volunteer."

Poverty hits thousands of Jewish kids: panel

Stephen Adler has a message for the community: there are Jewish poor, and we have to do something about it.

"In 2001, [the year of the last census] there were 19,745 Jews living below the poverty line, and that is disgusting. I would like to get people mobilized to help end poverty tomorrow," he said.

Adler, director of public policy and governmental affairs of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was speaking at a recent panel discussion, "Educate and Advocate: Jewish Poverty in Toronto," sponsored by United Jewish Appeal, Women's Philanthropy.

Also speaking was Laurel Rothman, national co-ordinator of Campaign 2000, a national coalition of more than 85 organizations formed in 1991, committed

Plenary observations

From the editor's desk...

It could be said that, among the many behavioural axioms authored by our wise, ancient rabbis that operate at plenary gatherings of Jewish communal organizations, two are paramount: hakarat hatov (acknowledging the good that others do for you) and hamayveen yaveen (one who truly understands, will really understand). The latter maxim, alas, loses not only its alliterative force when translated into English but also some of its slightly playful usage.

These two maxims dominated the often emotional proceedings last Sunday at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto during the 29th plenary session of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

The plenary gathering celebrated the 90th anniversary of the founding of CJC. This anniversary in and of itself was justification for effusive hakarat hatov. For, if it is true – and it is – that the Canadian Jewish community of some 350,000 is known by governments and non-governmental organizations worldwide for punching above its weight, then it is equally true that the CJC, especially after World War II, has been the pre-eminent iron fist in the community's glove, hitting constantly high and hard.

Saying thank you to certain individuals, acknowledging the good they have wrought for and on behalf of CJC was a key theme of the plenary. Thus, CJC thanked, among many others who were mentioned throughout the day, Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Sylvain Abitbol, the outgoing co-presidents of the CJC for their precedent-setting, two-headed work during the past term.

Similarly, there was an undeniable outpouring of love and gratitude that accompanied the awarding of the Samuel Bronfman Medal for outstanding Jewish community service to Julia and Henry Koschitzky.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper received the Saul Hayes Human Rights Award for rendering distinguished service to the cause of human rights. He was the first prime minister to be so honoured. The audience showered him with applause and affection.

The prime minister was one of four federal party leaders who addressed the gathering. And it was in relation to the politicians' participation in the plenary that the axiom hamayveen yaveen coursed through the air like occasional flashes of lightning on a damp night: not enough to obscure the landscape but enough to be noticed.

The party leaders spoke to the delegates of the CJC. At another level, of course – as those who truly understood, really understood, that is, mostly everyone in the room – they spoke to each other (though none spoke in the other's presence) and against the background of the stinging, occasionally malevolent cut and thrust of nasty, daily partisan politics.

Elizabeth May, leader of the Green party, was the first to address the assembly. She pointed out that it was the inaugural appearance by a leader of the Green party at a CJC plenary. She was relaxed, folsky, articulate, open and simply, very plainly happy to be part of the program.

"I am enormously honoured to have been asked to be here today," May said at the end of questions and answers.

Jack Layton, leader of the NDP, spoke next. His written remarks were a broad policy survey of his party's stance on a variety of social issues. He knew his party was not the favourite among the delegates in the room. Indeed, in the first question to Layton, the sage chair of the proceedings, Irving Abella, expressed what was on everyone's mind: that the most vocal critics of Israel and most voluble supporters of oppressors of human rights come today from the left.

Layton distanced his party from those leftist critics. Or tried to. But the more questions he answered, the more uncomfortable he seemed to become, especially in reference to issues concerning the labour movement, education and free speech.

Prime Minister Harper was the third to speak. He was lauded for his "principled and heroic" position concerning the treatment of Israel around the world. In accepting the award, he spoke assertively and confidently. Somewhat surprisingly, given the genial atmosphere of the occasion, he took a verbal swipe at unnamed politicians for their "doublespeak," for speaking at occasions such as the CJC plenary, yet attacking and condemning Israel when the Jewish state tries to defend itself.

Former CJC president and current member of Parliament Irwin Cotler introduced Opposition leader Michael Ignatieff in what was the most rousing address of the afternoon. Cotler clearly had the Conservative party's current anti-Ignatieff attack ads in mind, for he repeatedly emphasized Ignatieff's Canadianness.

Ignatieff delivered the keynote address of the afternoon, and he, too, had the prime minister in mind when he said forcefully, very forcefully, "My party will never claim to be the only genuine defenders of Israel in Canadian politics because I don't want my party to be alone in the defence of Israel. I want all parties to be genuine defenders of Israel."

Israel's vice-prime minister, Silvan Shalom, expressed the sigh that everyone in the room felt when he said he "was happy that in Canada there is bipartisan support for Israel."

There was plenty at this CJC plenary. And we all understood.

IN SUPPORT OF SCHALIT

At a major rally in New York City, 1,070 students joined with others to protest outside the offices of the International Committee for the Red Cross May 27, marking the 1,070 days that Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit has been held in captivity by the terrorist group Hamas, and urging the Red Cross to make an extra effort to meet with Schalit.

Court to rule on funding disabilities in religious schools

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An Ontario court was asked last week to order the provincial government to extend funding to children attending faith-based schools who are blind, deaf or have learning disabilities.

The current practice, in which children attending public or Roman Catholic schools receive such funding, is discriminatory and in violation of Charter guarantees to equal treatment regardless of disability or religion, say advocates for the children.

The case before a three-judge panel of the Divisional Court, pits eight families – seven Jewish, one Muslim – against the government of Ontario. "The thrust of our case is that if a child is blind, deaf or has a learning disability, it should not matter in Ontario what the child's religion is. It should not matter what school he goes to or what ministry the money comes from," said Allan Kaufman, one of the lawyers representing the families.

Kaufman said funding for an extension of health benefits to children in religious schools would not even require the province to allocate additional funds. It currently budgets $14.5 million per year to fund treatment of seven health-related disabilities of children in religious schools. Only about $4.5 million of that is currently being spent. "The money is there," Kaufman said. "[Health Minister David] Caplan can wave his pen and it would flow."

In documents filed with the court, the province rejected any suggestion of discrimination. The province argued the 1994 Adler decision – in which the Supreme Court ruled that there was no Charter violation in funding public and Roman Catholic schools and not those of other religions – also applied to the provision of health services.

Although the Mike Harris government in 2000 extended school health support services to private religious schools, "it cannot seriously be maintained that Ontario discriminated against children attending private religious schools by extending this benefit to them," the province argued.

The province also contended that special education programs, services and staff are provided by regulations under the Education Act, which applies only to public and Catholic schools. The extension of health support services to private religious schools in 2000 was done by regulation under the Long Term Care Act. The Education Act focuses on educational programs and services, while the LTCA is concerned with health-related services.

"This distinction is inherent in the purposes of the two statutes and is not simply a 'bureaucratic distinction…' The fact that Ontario has voluntarily chosen to extend funding for the health-related services set out in [a regulation] under the LTCA to eligible students in private and home schools imposes no obligation on the province to extend funding under the Education Act and its regulations to private schools or to expand the benefits provided by [the regulation]," government documents state.

Ira Walfish, who heads the Multifaith Coalition for Equal Funding of Faith Based Schools, said the decision by the Harris government to fund seven areas of disability (including physio, occupational and speech therapy) did not include deafness, blindness and learning disabilities.

However, an anomalous situation arose from application of the law. Under the seven areas now receiving government funding, speech therapy can proceed in Jewish schools "for speech impediments. After a time, the therapy stops" when those providing it deem the therapy to change from something health-related to something that involves education.

Walfish said the government's position is "bizarre," particularly since it is spending $10 million less than it has allocated for the seven permissible areas of health treatment. The money already allocated could fund all the special needs in the religious school system, he said, adding "from a dollar standpoint, this is a joke" relative to the province's $14.2-billion education budget.

Walfish suggested the real reason behind the government's reluctance to fund health benefits in religious schools is "they don't want to fund anything in faith-based schools."

Kaufman said funding for blind, deaf and learning disabled children in the public system has since 1984 been funnelled through the Education Ministry, so religious schools receive no government money. As he sees it, "it's just a question of moving money around… I don't care if it comes from the Ministry of Tourism. It's discriminatory not to flow it to disabled children in Jewish schools."

Kaufman and Raj Anand, former chief commissioner of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, represent parents with children who attended the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School (which closed after the lawsuit was launched) and currently attend Yeshivas Nefesh Dovid, Associated Hebrew Schools, United Synagogue Day School and Leo Baeck Day School, as well as a blind student at an Islamic school in Richmond Hill.

That girl first attended public school and "was treated like a queen." When her parents enrolled her in the Muslim school, "the government pulled everything for her. She gets nothing," Kaufman said.

Kaufman does not expect a decision in the case for several months.

Obama's test, Israel's risk

Some five months after his inauguration, U.S. President Barack Obama is being tested by the imperious, quizzical, perhaps even unstable leader of North Korea, Kim Jong Il. In quick succession last week, North Korea successfully detonated an underground nuclear device and then test-fired a series of short range ground to air missiles. Beyond any doubt, the diminutive dictator is poking Obama in his presidential chest to see if the American pokes back.

Obama immediately condemned North Korea and urged the world to "stand up to Pyongyang and demand that it honour a promise to abandon its nuclear ambitions." So, too, did the Europeans. The Russians and Chinese condemned Kim as well, for they also fear for the peace and security of the region, which is one they share with the mercurial North Korean.

The UN Security Council was called into action, in a manner of speaking. As of this writing, however, the council had not yet adopted any definitive measures against Kim and his regime. Predictably, in response to a statement by South Korea that it might join an international campaign to stop its northern neighbour from endeavouring to traffic in nuclear material, Kim threatened to take up arms against the South. The United States and South Korea have since placed their troops in the area on their highest alert in three years to counter what American officials termed a "grave threat."

Profound unease and queasy nervousness have once again descended upon Southeast Asia, and far beyond as well.

"Israel views the second North Korean nuclear test with extreme gravity," a foreign ministry spokesman said last week. "Israel is concerned with North Korea's nuclear proliferation, which has negative implications in this region. Israel expects the international community to respond decisively to the nuclear detonation by North Korea so as to transmit an unambiguous message to other countries" (our emphasis).

The message from Jerusalem is clear.

Experienced North Korea watchers such as commentator Gordon Chang point out that among the various other objectives for Kim's provocations, "North Korea appears set to go into high gear and merchandise its nuclear arsenal," Chang observes. "There is no greater threat than the proliferation of nuclear weapons to dangerous and hostile regimes… Another danger is the dissemination of nuclear technology to hostile states and their terrorist allies."

We know only too well, alas, at whom Kim markets his murderous merchandise. Syria has already participated in a now-defunct, nuclear project with North Korea, destroyed by Israel. The Iranians, it would not surprise us to learn, were probably on hand last week as observers of the North Korean detonation.

President Obama, it is true, is being tested by Kim. But if he fails the test, the abiding risk is squarely upon Israel.

CJC Quebec name change (1)

Further to the name change of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, to Congrès juif québécois, we should commend the CJC for exposing a wound within the Jewish community. From the comments following the announcement of the new name, we see the divisions between the Sephardi (French-speaking, for) and Ashkenazi (English-speaking, against) groups. Thanks for bringing out this itch for us to scratch. Just what we needed in these very difficult times: internal conflict.

CJC Quebec name change (2)

As the daughter of Joseph Parnass, one of the founding members of the Canadian Jewish Congress (1909), I feel a duty to honour the memory of my father, whose belief it always was that CJC was representative of the strong and proud voice of all Canadian Jews, wherever they might live.

Times may change, but values should not. I was appalled to learn of the name change of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, to Congrès juif québécois, which I see as patronizing.

Judge Seven Jewish Children for yourself

Within the Jewish community, public expressions of disagreement with the actions of the Israeli government strike a sensitive nerve, and indeed the play Seven Jewish Children by Caryl Churchill offers just such a criticism ("Rex Murphy lays bare play's moral inversion," CJN, May 28).

The play is a visceral criticism of the actions of the Israeli government in undertaking an asymmetrical siege of Gaza that resulted in considerable "collateral damage." Those of us who live in the Diaspora and who watched the extent of the devastation on television at very least must have questioned whether the Israeli strategy was worth the loss of life that occurred.

Beyond this legitimate question, the play compels the audience to weigh familial need, the need of Jewish parents to protect the interests of their children against the needs of another family, a Palestinian family. Psychologically, for the audience this "need to weigh" moves the play away from the political into the domain of the personal, and in so doing becomes an expression of the human tragedy, rather than an anti-Semitic polemic.

How often do we as parents use the familiar words "don't tell" and "tell" when we try to deal with our own children? It is the repeated use of these words that establishes the emotional tension as the play moves inexorably towards its unhappy conclusion.

I would encourage people to watch the play or read the text on the Internet and to consider how the kind of thinking it presents regrettably is not far off how any parent might respond to both her child's needs and her own. Use your own best judgment rather than trusting to ill-considered condemnations from community officials.

I used to know one Ezra Moses, who immigrated to Canada from India some 30 years ago. The last I heard of him and his family, they were in Ontario, after moving from Montreal. They visited India in 2000, and before that in 1997. Moses worked at Warner Hindustan, a pharmaceutical company in Hyderabad. His wife's name is Betty, and they have two daughters, Roneet and Karen. If you have any information about the family, please contact me.

Seeking a new Israel-Diaspora paradigm

Among the efforts he made to leave a positive mark on Israel that would remain long after his departure as prime minister, Ehud Olmert set out to transform the conceptual and practical relationship between the state and the Jewish Diaspora.

He began doing this last summer, when, in a speech before the Jewish Agency's board of governors, he said, "We must stop talking in terms of big brother and little brother, and instead speak in terms of two brothers marching hand in hand and supporting each other."

To translate thought to policy, his government tasked the Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI) with developing a new strategy for the state to become involved with the Diaspora, both fiscally and programmatically, in order to strengthen Jewish identity, especially insofar as it is connected to Israel.

While the JPPPI's project might seem to be relatively unimportant for the national agenda, the topic of its study – Israel's existence as a state connected to an extra-territorial people – strikes at the heart of the challenges the government will have to tackle in the years to come, including the essence of democracy in this land, citizenship, economic custody and advancing development.

The topic is pivotal because, before one can answer how the state might involve itself with the Diaspora, one needs to consider the more basic question: What is the practical essence of the relationship between the State of Israel and the Jewish nation? Answering this question depends just as much on the philosophy of the state as it does on the larger trends affecting all of humanity.

The challenge put forward by Olmert's government is based on a certain reading of history. Coming into existence as it did in the wake of the Holocaust, Israel has often seen itself and been perceived by others as the protector of, and a safe haven for, the Jewish People.

And a division of responsibility quickly developed: The state would defend, and the Diaspora would fund. Thus, when Jews were in danger – whether in Entebbe, Ethiopia or Argentina – Israeli Jews were called to arms. And when Israel was at war, Diaspora Jews were called upon to open their wallets. This paradigm of Israel as defender and Diaspora as enabler extends Israel's role from defending Jewish bodies to defending Jewish souls through efforts to fight assimilation among Jews abroad.

> 'Times are changing, and so are our relationships'

But times are changing, and so are our relationships. As Isaac Herzog, the minister of welfare and social services, said at a recent conference held by the Israel Venture Association, whereas governments were set up under the assumption that "citizens and residents are one and the same," today that is not necessarily the case because of the heightened mobility of the "creative class" and the demand for foreign workers that drives the Israeli economy. This new demographic reality demands a new understanding of the state's role.

The nation-state's founding assumption was that nations could be forged through common myth and culture, from the residents living within a given set of boundaries. If you lived within those boundaries, you were generally granted citizenship in return for acceptance of centrally mandated laws and majority-determined cultural and behavioural norms.

In this way, we speak of the French nation-state, even though there are more than a half-dozen ethnic groups in France that want nothing to do with the French nation, just as there are minorities elsewhere who are claimed as part of the nation writ large only because they inhabit the same territory.

The State of Israel was thus doubly special – first because it claimed to be the state of the Jews even as the majority of the Jewish nation still lived outside its boundaries, and second because it had no desire to integrate into the Jewish nation other, non-Jewish groups among its citizenry. Israel has thus been criticized for not behaving like a classic nation-state. But it might also be wrestling with a challenge a bit ahead of its time: the separation of citizenship and residency, of state and nation.

If Israel is not a nation-state, it might be more useful to think of it as a node-state; that is, as the sovereign element chosen by narrative and collective will at the centre of a global network. Whereas the entire network of the Jewish nation is interdependent, Israel as its centre would not be able to operate as a nation-state. That is to say, the State of Israel might benefit from the global network, but in its functioning, most of its focus would continue to be solely on basic domestic operations, those that affect only a small set of nodes on this network, and to permit only a minority of its network members to elect representatives whose decisions will affect the network as a whole.

For example, even though Israel's financial health depends just as much on foreign investment as it does on domestic production, it is the residents who determine the economic policy that affects the return on those investments, and therefore the network's overall health. As populations shift, this same network effect facing Israel will face other nations as well.

A global era and a globe-spanning people demand a global vision for the Jewish nation's collective governance institutions and a recognition of the state's role as a node-state within a wider community structure. As such, any new vision for the state's relationship with Diaspora Jews that is based on the old paradigm will be obsolete at birth.

Instead, we need a new vision for the state itself, a vision that grapples with our Altneuwelt as opposed to our Altneuland. Or to return to Olmert's speech, we are not two brothers walking together, separate and equal, but rather one body economic and politic living thanks to the blessings of our global interdependence, the many pieces of which make up a whole that we have yet to envision.

Opinions

A child's wisdom

Children are often confused by the adult world. But sometimes they see things more directly and openly. Theirs is a simple wisdom, not in the sense of senseless or weak, but rather of innocent, easy, unadorned, direct and often quite luminous.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Recently, my seven-year-old granddaughter offered her own insight into God's presence in our lives. She was learning the Shema prayers that are recited at night at bed time and the Modeh Ani (gratitude) prayers said upon waking. Her mother was trying to pry out of her what she had learned – what they could possibly mean to her?

We're in strange territory here. The evening Shema is the last prayer one utters as one goes to sleep. A religious child is taught to rely on God at this point: God will watch over you or embrace your soul while you sleep. As you awake, your first thought is to thank God for returning life to you. The concepts are sophisticated, but they could also be frightening and difficult to impart to a small child.

Is sleep like death? And what is death? We don't want to alarm children or scare them. Sleep should be welcomed and easy, but often it's not. So how will a teacher manage these prayers and these teachings? And even with the best of intentions, how will a child receive the lesson?

After much prodding, my granddaughter groped for the right expression. What words does a small child have even to explain her own feelings. Finally, she found refuge in a metaphor. "It's like the dry cleaners. God gives it back to you in the morning all clean!"

After laughing – about God as the Great Dry Cleaner in Heaven – I had to think about the wisdom in her comparison. I know that if this remains a facile or mechanistic model, it will do her no good. But if we understand it as the beginning stage of her appreciation, there's much to learn from such a model.

Firstly, sleep is good, not frightening. Secondly, God is helpful. Importantly, when you make mistakes, they can be cleared up. Sins are stains, but with the correct efforts, they can be "cleaned." Of course, we must make the correct atonements to clean them up. We also should not wait for once a year to clean up. We can do it daily or nightly. Finally, when we "wake up," we should always say thank you.

We must be grateful for life every day.

Pretty impressive lessons.

Shavuot reminds us of our sobering challenge

A midrash: Moses, seeing the Egyptians hard on the Israelites' heels, prays to God to save them.

God replies something like, "Why are you crying out to me? Do something!"

A Sholom Aleichem-like story: murderous riders press hard on the heels of the pintele Yid as he bursts into the study-house. "Listen Jews! The Cossacks are coming! Do something! Say Tehillim!"

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Study? Pray? Or get out your best weaponry? Shavuot has challenged us all to consider how we approach the study and application of our vocation as Jews, the eternal struggle to balance study with action.

Leaving aside the weapons, on Shavuot in Greater Vancouver, hundreds of Jews took part in Tikkun Leyl Shavuot and continued for the entire weekend to enjoy study and prayer together. Hopefully that study will translate into action.

When we arrived in Vancouver more than 40 years ago, there were three synagogue buildings: a small beit hamidrash, a large Conservative synagogue and a similarly large Orthodox synagogue. Two other congregations, one Reform, also met in various incarnations.

Today our community has grown to offer a wide variety of worship options. We may not seem significant when compared to giant Toronto or venerable Montreal, but we have become a community that serves more than 16 congregations and worship groups: Conservative, chassidic, Orthodox, Renewal and Reform, based both in Vancouver itself and the suburbs.

Best of all, our rabbis meet in a collegial atmosphere at RAV, the Rabbinic Association of Vancouver.

This Shavuot, we had an excess of riches. For example, the eminent Hebrew University professor of the talmudic period, Yeshiyahu Gafni, taught the entire weekend at one synagogue, bringing the history and art of the Talmud and midrash alive.

Rabbi Elana Zaiman, a chaplain in Seattle, taught us how to deepen our life experiences through Torah study and gave a workshop on writing ethical wills. Our cantor led us in spirited song as we rejoiced in the gift of Torah. Other congregations and study groups met throughout the night in similar study.

All over the world, Jews spent the night in prayer and reflection, in song and study. The power of this idea has been attributed to the Kabbalists of Safed during the time of Rabbi Isaac Luria and mentioned in the Zohar, Parshat Emor (which was written in the 13th century in Spain and attributed to Rabbi Shimon Bar Yohai).

The night of study and prayer to raise the souls of participants to the highest level of spiritual awareness has taken hold and become a tradition all over the Jewish world. Our senses are sharpened, more attuned to insights and, for a few, perhaps visions of something above the mundane. Every year we strive for this.

How fortunate we are to be a part of this thriving community, with its vital leadership and increased learning opportunities – the recital of psalms, as it were.

And how important it is that, armed with this knowledge, we as individuals and as a community can increase our level of mitzvot as a result of what we learn – going forward into the Reed Sea, taking action.

There's just one other thing.

All the voices raised in study and debate on the evening of Shavuot still constitute a small minority of Jews in our community. To come together in our synagogues and study halls is wonderful. To realize that many Jews will never cross those thresholds is a challenge. Surely this must also be true of other communities.

As I have noted in other columns, a recent survey of our community's attitudes and practices revealed – and no statistic should be taken at face value when the respondents are self-selecting – that the number of people identifying with a denomination is decreasing from generation to generation. That holds across the denominational board.

We need to start looking beyond our doors. Opening them wide for others to enter is fine, but it's just not enough.

How to go beyond our corner of the Jewish world to spread the riches of our heritage – that's the challenge we face.

Anti-Semitism in Buenos Aires

Recently, my wife and I travelled to Buenos Aires, where I lectured at four different universities. Buenos Aires is a modern, cosmopolitan city with a population of about 15 million.

There are many signs of a healthy Jewish community. In one mall, there were two McDonald's restaurants – one with the regular menu and the other designated "McDonald's kosher." Around the corner from where we stayed was a kosher sushi restaurant.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

We attended a Kabalat Shabbat service at Congregacion Israelita de la Republica Argentina, the oldest synagogue in the country. The congregation is affiliated with the Conservative movement, but the service reflected both Conservative and Reform traditions. The service included beautiful vocal and instrumental arrangements of both new and traditional melodies.

Unfortunately, there is an undercurrent of insecurity in the Jewish community. Newcomers to the synagogue must call in advance to advise that they are coming and are required to prove their identity before being admitted. Cars and taxis are prevented from stopping directly in front of the building, and purses and bags are searched before people are allowed inside. This is, of course, not surprising in light of the terrorist attacks that are still in the forefront of people's memories.

First, there was the bombing of the Israeli Embassy in 1992, which killed 32 people. This was followed in 1994 by the bombing of the Buenos Aires Jewish community centre, when more than 85 people were killed and over 100 injured. The subsequent investigations of the community centre attack have been painfully slow, and it was not until recently that they began to yield concrete results, including implications of Iranian complicity in the attack.

These attacks occurred 15 years ago, but during our visit, we found ourselves in the midst of yet another assault on the Jewish community.

Three days after our arrival, we attended Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations, marking the 61st anniversary of the establishment of the State of Israel, held in a public square outside the Buenos Aires City Hall. There was a large crowd. A marching band performed stirring versions of the Argentine national anthem and Hatikvah, and the Argentine minister of education spoke, followed by warm remarks from Daniel Gazit, the Israeli ambassador to Argentina.

Suddenly, without warning, there was an attack by a group of people who rushed the stage and disrupted the celebrations. Their violence led to the bloodied face of one of the organizers. The police hurried the Israeli ambassador into City Hall and arrested five of the attackers.

Later, another five people were arrested. They were charged with various offences related to the injuries incurred, as well as conspiracy and the possession of firearms.

Day after day, the perpetrators were described in all news accounts as anti-Semitic members of the Revolutionary Action Front, a far-left organization. The Israeli government asked for a full investigation of the incident. A day after the attack, two synagogues in the Belgrano neighbourhood of Buenos Aires received bomb threats and had to evacuated.

While in Buenos Aires, we stayed in an apartment complex near the residence of the Israeli ambassador. Not surprisingly, there is a 24-hour police presence outside his building, and after the attack at City Hall, the police presence was significantly increased.

This clearly was not simply an anti-Israel protest, but rather, like recent events that occurred on Canadian campuses and on Toronto and Montreal streets during "Israeli Apartheid Week," it was a manifestation of anti-Semitism. Often described as the "new anti-Semitism," it clearly knows no boundaries.

The Argentine government was clearly embarrassed by the Yom Ha'atzmaut attack. It should be remembered that this is the same government that was recently highly critical of Bishop Richard Williamson and subsequently expelled him from Argentina for his denial of the Holocaust.

We experienced in Buenos Aires a dynamic and welcoming Jewish community in an exciting world-class city. But wherever one travels and wherever one lives, one has to remain aware that the vicious spectre of anti-Semitism may at any time rear its ugly head.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Konstanz

Konstanz, better known in English as Constance, is situated in a scenic and fertile fold of southwestern Germany. Such is its generally mild climate that palm trees flourish here, at least in pots. Vineyards and orchards are also common in this bucolic region between the fabled Black Forest and Bavaria.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

This town of about 85,000 inhabitants, in the state of Baden-Wurttemberg, lies along the shore of Germany's largest lake, the Bodensee, which borders on Switzerland and Austria.

On a clear day, which is quite often, there are tantalizing views of the snow-capped, crystalline Alps.

Settled by the Romans around 50 CE, Konstanz – a seat of the Protestant Reformation – was absorbed by Habsburg Austria in the 16th century.

Subsequently, a redoubt of the Catholic faith and the place where Czech philosopher and religious reformer/martyr Jan Hus was burned at the stake, Konstanz was Austrian until 1806, when it passed into the hands of the Grand Duchy of Baden.

Ruth Frenk

Esthetically, Konstanz is a marvel, distinguished by a profusion of architectural styles ranging from Renaissance to art nouveau, and by several medieval city gates that escaped destruction in the mad rush toward modernity and conformity.

The Niederburg, the oldest quarter, is a jumble of crooked streets and lanes and half-timbered buildings, some adorned with frescoes and golden Gothic lettering.

Unlike many towns in this country, Konstanz was spared by the ravages of World War II. As a result, its priceless ensemble of antique buildings, from the 15th-century town hall to the 19th- century imperial post office, were preserved.

While German cities like Berlin, Hamburg, Frankfurt and Dresden were devastated by Allied air raids, with horrific civilian casualties, Konstanz was never bombed.

Since it is adjacent the sleepy Swiss town of Kreuzlingen, the Allies did not bomb Konstanz. Allied bombers tried not to violate Switzerland's neutrality and touch off an international incident.

Nonetheless, due to navigation errors, equipment failure and weather conditions, Allied aircraft dropped bombs on Swiss towns and cities, including Zurich, Basel and Geneva, causing fatalities and property damage and forcing the Allies to pay reparations.

In the most serious case of its kind, the U.S. Air Force misidentified Schaffhausen as a German town, bombing it on April 1, 1944. Forty Swiss citizens were killed and numerous buildings were destroyed.

By that point, the Jewish residents of Konstanz had been deported by the Nazis and the synagogue, consecrated in 1883, had been desecrated.

Jews have lived in Konstanz, on and off, since the 13th century, their presence subject to the whims of its rulers and the times.

The Jewish quarter, in what is now an altogether charming and gentrified section of the town, was concentrated between the Munzgasse and the Salmannsweilergasse and along Rosgartenstrasse.

During the Black Death, when they were accused of poisoning wells, more than 300 Jews were killed. Jews were expelled in 1533, permitted to enter Konstanz only with permission.

Allowed back in, Jewish merchants and craftsmen returned in the mid-19th century.

On the eve of the Adolf Hitler's accession to power in 1933, Konstanz was home to slightly less than 500 Jews. As anti-Semitism intensified, they emigrated from Germany.

On Kristallnacht, on Nov. 10,1938, the SS obliterated the ornate synagogue in a fiery foreshadowing of the Holocaust.

In 1966, a Jewish businessman bought the plot of land where the shul had stood undisturbed for 55 years and in its place built a six-storey building on the ground of which is a restaurant bar.

I don't know how many Jews from Konstanz attempted to cross into neighbouring Switzerland after Kristallnacht. An unguarded mesh wire fence separates parts of Konstanz from Kreuzlingen today, and on a lark, I walked into Switzerland one fine morning. No questions asked and no passport necessary. But in the late 1930s, the border was scrupulously patrolled and such incursions would simply have been impossible.

By 1940, when Germany invaded France and the low countries and the lives of German Jews had become intolerable, a small number of Jewish burghers still remained in Konstanz, unable or unwilling to leave.

On Oct. 22, 108 Jews were deported to Gurs, an internment camp in France that originally housed refugees from Spain. Amid appalling conditions, some died. The rest were transported to Auschwitz and Sobibor in 1942, and there they were murdered.

As a memorial to them, a black marble monument stands on Sigismundstrasse, which is close to the commercial district and a short walk from the railway station, where many Jews resided before the Nazi era. Their names – Lina Weil, Anna Weiler, Moses Forszt and Ludwig Bab, to name but four of the victims – are engraved in the stone in four languages, German, English, French and Hebrew.

So-called stumble stones commemorate the tragedy of the Holocaust as well. These unobtrusive brass markers, containing the names and addresses of the victims of National Socialism, are embedded in sidewalks throughout Konstanz and in German towns.

With the war over and Nazi Germany vanquished, Eastern European Jewish survivors who had been liberated from concentration camps settled in Konstanz. The majority departed soon afterward. By the late 1960s, only 30 Jews resided in Konstanz. Three hundred Jews live in Konstanz today, mainly from the former Soviet Union, but also from other European nations and Israel.

In 1974, when Konstanz had about 100 Jews, a 28-year-old Jewish singer and voice teacher from Rotterdam, Holland, named Ruth Frenk arrived to study with her teacher.

Frenk, whose mother was a German Jew and whose father was a Dutch Jew, thought that she was merely passing through. "I somehow stayed on," said Frenk, who initially earned a living singing traditional Jewish songs. "There was a need for it. No one else was doing it. And I liked Konstanz."

With the collapse of the Soviet Union, the Jewish community was immeasurably bolstered by new arrivals. "We were not prepared for these people," said Frenk, the president of the local German-Israel society. "There was no infrastructure to absorb them properly."

In addition, they knew very little about Judaism and did not speak German, said Frenk, who commutes to Israel regularly to meet her partner in Tel Aviv.

Unable to fit into German society, many of the elderly among them subsist on social welfare payments. "They have a rough time," said Frenk.

Three years ago, the community split into two seemingly irreconcilable factions after the president, a wealthy Polish-born Jew, decreed that it would abide by Orthodox rather than Conservative rites in order to integrate the Russian newcomers. Jews like Frenk rebelled, triggering the schism.

Due to these divisions, paralysis has set in and the community has not taken possession of a piece of land that Konstanz donated for a new synagogue. As of last month, the impasse was as deep and raw as ever.

Iran setting international agenda, expert contends

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ze'ev Maghen

Ze'ev Maghen is an expert on Iran, but unlike many other observers of the Islamic state, he doesn't believe the country's leaders would risk a nuclear apocalypse just for the chance to destroy Israel.

The Iranian leadership certainly does seek Israel's destruction, but they "care if Israel destroys Tehran. They don't mind martyrdom, but why do that if everything is going so well?" he said.

Maghen, chair of the department of Middle East studies at Bar-Ilan University, was in Toronto last week as scholar-in-residence at Beth Sholom Synagogue. He flew to Toronto from the United States, where he met with intelligence officials eager to broaden their sources of information about the region.

Iranian leaders believe their influence is spreading throughout the Middle East – into Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and the Hamas-controlled Gaza Strip, he said. They believe they are succeeding in their long-term goals of regional hegemony and international influence. Why mess with a winning formula?

"Iran's goal is not merely to attack Tel Aviv. Their goal is much grander. They want to eradicate Israel as a state, but that's only a first step." Eliminating Israel would remove what the Iranians see as a "western outpost" and create a "beachhead into Europe," he said.

The conflict would continued there based on "demography and kulturkampf [culture war]", while a nuclear-armed Iran would possess "another tool in the arsenal of the Islamists to increase their influence in the world." Maghen gave his evaluation just days after Iran test-launched a missile with a 2,500-kilometre range, able to hit European targets.

A senior fellow at the Shalem Center think-tank in Jerusalem, Maghen said the policy-making echelon of the U. S. government requires "people with vision who want to take the country in [a particular] direction." Otherwise, U.S. policy will be reactive and adversarial.

He suggested that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and Iran "are the initiative-takers in world politics, and you see the West, the United States, Israel and Europe reacting and trying to adjust policies according to what Ahmadinejad and his cohorts are doing."

As for the United States under President Barack Obama, "I don't think they have a Mideast policy. I think it's clear to everybody that Obama and all his good intentions is feeling his way and making it up as he goes along. Relying on whatever idealistic vision he had is bumping up to the reality of people who don't share his progressive view of the world."

The U.S. president has created a problem for himself by reversing longstanding American policy of not talking to Iran as long as it continues to enrich nuclear material. Maghen, who reads the Persian media, said Iranian newspapers are "laughing" at the United States, believing they have the upper hand. The United States is seen as truckling to Iran and "Obama has elected Ahmadinejad by coming to the table," he said, referring to Iran's June 12 presidential election.

Obama has linked progress in the peace process with mobilization of the region against Iranian ambitions, but Maghen, who consults for the Israeli defence ministry, said "he'll probably end up hitting his head against the Palestinian brick wall like everybody else."

In the meantime, Iran will continue to pursue its goal of a nuclear weapon, which it will use as "another tool in the arsenal of the Islamists to increase their influence in the world."

Referring to instability in nuclear-armed Pakistan, Maghen suggested that country, a Sunni nation, could fall to Islamic forces.

"Some believe Israel has to live with MAD [mutual assured destruction – a Cold War-era doctrine of deterrence]" vis-a-vis its Islamic neighbours.

But if Israel does bomb Iranian nuclear facilities, "you send a warning that we won't tolerate being threatened. That's the likely scenario," he said.

Rabbi Saltzman honoured for 20 years of service

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Steven Saltzman – a cello player, black belt in karate and former student of subatomic physics – is being honoured for his 20 years of service to Adath Israel Congregation on June 13.

The Denver, Colo. native who grew up in New York, was ordained by New York's Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) in 1977, when the Conservative movement had yet to admit women to rabbinical school, a change that happened the following decade. He also has a doctorate of Hebrew literature from JTS.

Rabbi Steven Saltzman

A staunch and vocal traditionalist, Rabbi Saltzman, who will be 60 in July, said his 1,800-member synagogue offers "an authentic, traditional experience of Judaism within the context of an open-minded approach to philosophical and theological issues."

At Adath Israel – the only Conservative congregation in Toronto that does not allow intermarried Jews to become members – being open-minded "means that there is no question that cannot be asked and no position that cannot be explored, but it isn't license to allow for any and all practice," said the rabbi in an interview in his synagogue study.

Clarifying the shul's policy on interfaith couples, he said, "We welcome [them] to daven with us, to study with us, to explore issues of Judaism with us, but until such time as the family is unified as a Jewish family, we're not prepared to accept the membership of that family."

There was "plenty" of flak after that policy became widely known as the result of a 2002 CJN article, Rabbi Saltzman said.

He recalled the aftermath with apparent equanimity, noting that criticism is standard "any time you stand up for something deemed by popular culture not to be inclusive."

Early in his career – following a two year stint as Hillel director at Tufts University from 1977 to 1979, and a subsequent five years in Rehovot as rabbi of Adat Shalom Congregation – Rabbi Saltzman spent two years as assistant rabbi at Har Zion Temple in Penn Valley, Pa., which was already fully egalitarian.

In contrast, women at Adath Israel do not receive Torah honours, although they are permitted to read from the siddur and offer divrei Torah from the bimah. Bat mitzvah girls can read the Haftarah.

The rabbi's philosophy has not changed, he said. His role at the Pennsylvania synagogue was to teach, assist the senior rabbi, and officiate at some life cycle events, not to set religious policy, he explained.

As well, he was there "to learn how to be a rabbi in the United States." His mentor was Rabbi Gerald Wolpe, who died May 18 of cancer. Rabbi Saltzman recalls him as "a master rabbi" and "a very fine fellow."

Rabbi Saltzman said he would still daven in an egalitarian setting, but "it's just not the sort of davening I want to do on a weekly basis, and not the sort of davening I want to give to my congregants."

He said he thoroughly enjoyed services at Holy Blossom Temple when he exchanged pulpits with Rabbi John Moscowitz. "I respect the passion and the religious sincerity and seriousness of that synagogue and those people, absolutely."

In late 2005, Rabbi Saltzman proposed establishing a Canadian "sovereignty association" within the Conservative movement because of increasing ideological differences between the movement here and in the United States, where non-egalitarian congregations are more prevalent and openly gay students are admitted to Conservative rabbinical schools, a concept that became reality in 2007.

Adath Israel was one of three synagogues in Toronto that left the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism last year, although the reasons given at the time were not necessarily theological.

Rabbi Saltzman believes that in the United States, Conservative Judaism cannot "reasonably" be described as halachic. He said he considers himself Conservative.

His 20 years as senior rabbi of Adath Israel have been less about highlights than "a daily commitment to a congregation and to the people of this congregation, helping them when they have issues of life rituals, counselling, but, for the most part, teaching.

Top-of-the-list Jewish issues for him include increasing Jewish literacy – knowledge of Hebrew language, classical text and Jewish law and philosophy – as well as creating community in the synagogue.

One change he's noted over the years is that about 60 per cent of brides and grooms whose marriages he performs have met on JDate or another online site.

The rabbi and his wife Fran – the first Jewish female officer in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, whom he also met on JDate and married in December 2004 – are offering a session on "Ethical Internet Dating" June 8 at the synagogue.

On June 13, when Rabbi Saltzman is honoured, Rabbi Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom Temple, will deliver a guest sermon. A festive kiddush will also be part of the program.

Crisis on Canadian Campuses

A Deceptive Campaign of Misinformation is Being Used to Destroy the State of Israel.

Universities are the new battleground being used by Radical Iran to demonize Israel. "Ethnic Cleansing" – "Apartheid" – "Collective Punishment" are key words meant to deceive the public and undermine the genuine victims.

A campaign of hate has permeated our campuses and, one by one, they are being taken over.

The following program will analyze, through the mirror of history, what has transpired on university campuses in the past several years and consider these events in the context of the upcoming conference (to be held a week later at York University) which calls for a "One State Solution" – a euphemism for the destruction of the State of Israel.

Community makes butterflies for Holocaust exhibit

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Members of the Toronto Jewish community are contributing to an initiative by the Holocaust Museum in Houston to collect 1.5 million handmade butterflies to commemorate the Jewish children who were killed in the Holocaust.

The museum will use the butterflies to create an exhibition scheduled to open in 2012.

When Justine Apple, co-ordinator for Kulanu Toronto – a Hillel-affiliated Jewish social group for gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgendered, transexual, and intersexed people – heard about the project, she wanted to be a part of it.

Late last month, Apple connected with Carson Phillips, an educator with the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, who introduced the project to Apple.

Apple said about a dozen people gathered at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life to learn about the artwork created by children in the Terezin concentration camp and to create their own pieces of art to honour the child Holocaust victims.

"Carson started the whole evening by actually telling us about the children in Theresienstadt and then he gave us all these poetry books he has from the Holocaust centre that contain poems by kids," Apple said.

"He gave us an opportunity to quietly read through some poems in the book. We picked poems that resonated with us that we would read out loud. We shared the poetry with each other and the room was extremely quiet."

She added that the poetry helped inspire the participants.

"When I asked them to tell me about their butterfly, a simplest looking butterfly had so much meaning behind it. They were very beautiful and personal and sometimes sad. The whole evening was very moving."

Apple said she learned from Phillips that the museum chose to collect butterflies because much of the artwork created by children in the concentration camps contained butterflies.

"The symbolism behind the butterflies is that it's a symbol of freedom, a symbol of the future, a symbol of moving into a happier time… a coming out of the hell of the Holocaust."

Apple said that the museum asked that glitter or food, such as macaroni or candy, not be used in making the butterflies, but people were free to use any other material including pipe cleaners, fake flower petals, tissue paper, construction paper, and magazine and newspaper cutouts.

Michelle Delverde, the principal of a Jewish supplementary school for the Danforth Jewish Circle, an egalitarian Jewish community group, said she learned about the project from Apple and was eager to get her students involved.

Andrea Lacroix and Tamar Lewin showcasing their handmade butterflies which will be sent to the Holocaust Museum in Houston, Texas for their butterfly exhibit in 2012.

Delverde said that the biggest challenge was adjusting the project to make it appropriate for all the students from preschool age to bnei mitzvah age.

"The youngest kids were taught about the program from the framework of being free to learn about being Jewish and the freedom to be Jewish," Delverde said.

"They were also taught that we are making butterflies today to make the world remember the importance of being free to be Jewish and how a long time ago, not so long ago when your grandparents were little kids, it was not okay or safe to be Jewish in some parts of the world."

She said that they made 50 butterflies for the museum's exhibit.

As of last summer, the Holocaust Museum in Houston collected more than 400,000 butterflies.

Apple said that while schools and synagogues are likely to become involved in a project such as this, she hopes Kulanu Toronto's involvement will inspire other gay organizations to do their part.

"I thought it would be unique and special for us to spearhead this effort and hopefully inspire other gay groups, not just in Toronto, but Montreal, Ottawa and Vancouver, to start the same thing."

Apple added that during the Holocaust, homosexuals were also among those targeted and murdered by the Nazis.

"They had to wear pink triangles [to identify them as being gay]. There is so much documentation about that, so many documentaries that have been filmed about that and every Holocaust Education Week there is always talk about gay people and how they were discriminated against."

Kulanu, which organizes events and programs throughout the year, is hosting a lecture titled "Twice blessed: The joys, not oys, of being Jewish and LBGT," at Congregation Darchei Noam on June 7.

Be sensitive to infertile couples' feelings, panel told

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec congregation, knows that many couples who suffer from infertility often feel deprived, inadequate and shamed.

The rabbi, First Steps Fertility (FSF) clinic founder Dr. Fay Weisberg, FSF clinic manager Shira Benson, and former FSF patient Roslyn Angel Kaman were part of a May 26 discussion panel at Beth Tikvah Synagogue that addressed the emotional, physical and spiritual challenges associated with infertility and its treatments.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl

Angel Kaman shared her experience of having spent nine years trying to conceive. When she and her husband, Howard, decided to have a child when she was 32, they spent two years trying the "old-fashioned way" before seeking help.

"We felt like we were the only people who couldn't have a baby," Angel Kaman said.

After experimenting with fertility drugs, they moved on to insemination, when sperm is injected directly into the uterus.

Angel Kaman was overcome by tears when she recalled finally becoming pregnant by insemination after five years of trying, only to suffer a miscarriage shortly thereafter. She conceived twice more, but both pregnancies were ectopic, when an embryo implants outside the uterus and eventually miscarries.

They decided to move on to in vitro fertilization (IVF), and within three cycles, they succeeded only in producing a blighted ovum, or an empty sac with no embryo.

"I was almost 40 years old, the age I told myself I would stop trying to have a baby… I did a lot of soul-searching and came to the realization that what I really wanted was to be a parent."

It was then she and her husband began to pursue adoption.

But when she read an article in The CJN about a fertility discovery at Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel, she and her husband had new hope.

"While my mind was saying that I was done with fertility treatments, and that I wouldn't go through it again, my heart was saying, 'One more time, just one more time.'"

The article explained that an accidental discovery was made by Weizmann professor Nava Dekel.

Usually, only 20 to 50 per cent of fertilized embryos result in a successful pregnancy after they are transferred to the uterus. But after Dekel and her team gave women a uterine biopsy – scraping a small amount of tissue from the uterus – the success rate increased by 50 per cent.

Dekel explained that the local injury of the uterus doubled the chance of having a viable pregnancy.

Angel Kaman contacted the Israeli doctors, who sent a detailed description of the procedure to her fertility doctor in Toronto, Dr. Fay Weisberg.

Finally, after nine years, the Kamans were expecting a baby.

"For the next nine months, I became cautiously optimistic. This was my fifth pregnancy, and I had a hard time letting myself get excited," Angel Kaman said.

"It wasn't until Oct. 23 [2008], when I held Hannah in my arms for the first time that I really believed that it was true."

The story ends with a beautiful, healthy baby girl, but the Kamans are all too familiar with the pain and helplessness couples feel when they're unable to conceive.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, who offered a spiritual approach to dealing with the issue, said that Jewish tradition regards a good marriage as one that includes loving companionship and children.

"We recognize that procreation, having children, is a mitzvah. But what happens when you're not able to have children? My experience is that couples often feel deprived, inadequate, unlucky, shamed, as if one has let down the other, as if one is letting down one's family," he said.

"Some people feel that since the Jewish community puts such an emphasis on having children that they may be letting down God, may be letting down the Jewish people."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said that the Jewish community must be sensitive to the struggle some people have with fertility and help them feel valued as human beings and Jews.

He added that it's important to understand that if a couple can't have children, "the mitzvah of having children is no longer operative."

That is, if a couple is unable to naturally conceive, they aren't obligated to seek alternative, often costly, methods.

Weisberg, who offered a more clinical approach to infertility, gave a presentation dispelling myths and misconceptions about infertility and offered advice about how couples can give themselves the best chance to conceive.

The main message was that women have a biological clock that's ticking, and after 35, it ticks quickly.

A woman's eggs age with her, and the number of quality eggs a woman produces decreases with age, she added.

"The older you get, the less eggs you have. Our ovaries have an expiration date."

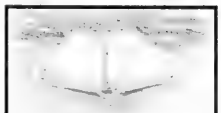
Samson: unique for being born great

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS



Rabbinic Reflections

The Haftorah for this week's Torah reading is the story of the birth of Shimshon, Samson the Judge.

The Torah reading describes the unusual mitzvah of the nazirite. If a person feels so moved, they may take upon themselves restrictions that are above and beyond what the Torah already requires. They may choose to be a nazirite and swear off wine, contact with the dead and cutting their hair.

Being a nazir is not in vogue in our modern world – we like wine, we like cutting our hair, and contact with the dead is an unfortunate, but important, mitzvah. And besides, keeping the restrictions of the Torah is plenty of work without adding more restrictions.

But even in modern times, there was a famous and prominent nazir: Rabbi Dovid Cohen, the Nazir. The Nazir, as he was affectionately known, was Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook's right-hand man from the 1920s until Rabbi Kook's death in 1935. The Nazir remained prominent as one of the heads of Rabbi Kook's Yeshiva Mercaz Harav, and his son, Rabbi Shaar Yashuv Cohen, the chief rabbi of Haifa, remains prominent to this day. I once heard Rabbi Shaar Yashuv Cohen describe how his father insisted that all the members of his family take an oath to be a nazir for a month, just to see what it was like.

Samson was a nazir. He didn't drink wine or cut his hair. But he was a nazir from the womb. Now, not cutting your hair while in the womb isn't very hard. But his mother was also restricted from drinking wine while pregnant, hence he was a real nazir from the womb.

And the Haftorah describes that after Samson's birth, the spirit of God again rang throughout the land.

But let me be frank: Samson aside, greatness is not hatched from the womb. And that's what makes him unusual as a leader – he was already so destined from the womb.

Most leaders aren't born leaders. They are born babies, then get older and become more learned. Then they become leaders.

Samson may have been born a nazir and born with a spirit of holiness, but most of us acquire our holiness and our leadership with perseverance and dedication. Sure, many people are endowed with gifts of leadership, qualities that serve them well and, if used properly, help them to attain leadership.

But these gifts are only leadership material unless they are built upon and realized. Gifts from the womb, if left unrealized, remain only gifts. They don't make people leaders.

The sub-theme of the story of Samson is unstated. Samson was a nazir from the womb, thus he was holy from the womb. But for the rest of us, though we may be granted many wonderful, divine gifts, leadership is developed, not bestowed from on high.

Hockey in Hamilton

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Like most children growing up in Canada, hockey was a beloved part of my childhood. Doing my best imitation of Bobby Hull – for some strange reason I was a Chicago Blackhawks fan – I would fire a slapshot and imagine it was the potential Stanley Cup winning goal. Little did I realize that hockey was anything more than a game.

As the ownership saga of the Phoenix Coyotes (Hamilton Blackberries?) plays out in court, we're reminded once again that the game itself, at least in the professional ranks, is little more than a product peddled to generate money for players, owners, advertisers, television networks and a host of other spinoff industries.

From the perspective of Jewish law, the crucial debate on whether Jerry Moyes, the "owner" of the Coyotes, had the right to declare bankruptcy is almost irrelevant. Jewish law, at least in theory, doesn't recognize the concept of bankruptcy, insisting that a debtor is never released from paying amounts due.

The notion that one can declare bankruptcy, start a new and successful business and yet not pay one's prior debts is one that Jewish law could not accept. While a creditor may not demand payment when the debtor is in no position to pay, if and when the situation reverses, payment must be made, and no declarations can alter that. Even if one were to accept that living in Canada, we're allowed to follow the law of the land in declaring bankruptcy, this is acceptable from a legal perspective only, not from a moral one.

With hundreds of millions of dollars owed to creditors, the first and primary obligation of the Phoenix Coyotes is to repay those creditors. Considerations of who owns what and where are secondary to this basic obligation. If Jim Balsillie's offer is the best on the table, that's the one that must be accepted. If the NHL wants to keep the team in Phoenix, it would be obligated to match the bid itself, if no other offers came forward.

Even if no bankruptcy were involved, it's morally questionable whether one can insist that a buyer accept a lower bid for his product, something that happened with Balsillie's attempted purchase of the Nashville Predators franchise a few years ago. Denying a franchisee the right to maximize his investment is something Jewish law would frown on.

One of the complicating factors in bringing the team to Hamilton is the fact that a Hamilton team would be infringing on the exclusive territorial rights given to NHL franchises. Thus both the Toronto Maple Leafs and Buffalo Sabres could effectively block the move or demand compensatory fees in the millions of dollars. Such concerns would be dismissed in a Jewish court of law.

Most authorities maintain that Jewish law offers no protection against competition from rival sources, unless the rules by which they operate are inherently unjust – for instance, one firm is taxed at a higher rate. Even those who maintain that Jewish law offers some protection do so only in a situation in which a market is too small to support a competing firm. A claim for protection of monopoly or near monopoly profits would go unheeded in Jewish law.

Thus even if a seventh Canadian team would lower the profits of the Maple leafs – something that's very far from certain – protection would not even be considered (and even then, it would be rejected by many) until such point as Southern Ontario (and Western New York) could only support one hockey team, a claim no one has suggested.

From the perspective of Jewish law, we can prepare to welcome the Phoenix Coyotes back to Canada. After all, they were once the Winnipeg Jets, the hockey team that was home to Bobby Hull when he was in the WHA, a league established to compete with the NHL that eventually merged with it.

Go Hamilton, go!

The Pope confronts the Holocaust: a Jewish appreciation

By JAMES A. DIAMOND

Guest Voice

A few years ago, I defended Pope Benedict XVI in print for comments he made regarding Islam that evoked viscerally negative reactions from Muslims worldwide. I now find myself compelled to defend the Pope once again, this time against the withering criticism of my own Jewish coreligionists in response to his recent speech at Yad Vashem, the Holocaust museum in Jerusalem.

James A. Diamond

What both controversies share, to my mind, is a problem that is endemic to the current times as a whole. In an age of instant gratification, where information is expected to be received and assimilated within seconds, we have lost the art of patient, conscientious reading and, what is worse, of listening and hearing the message of the words we now are exposed to in curt, digestible excerpts that relieve us of our obligation to read. Now, as then, the Pope's remarks are being judged by a common penchant for an immediate message in a headline or a truncated sentence liberated of any grammatical and syntactical structure.

When I first read the full transcript of the Pope's speech, I was struck by its literary beauty, its theological depth and its profound sensitivity to the deep-seated trauma of the Holocaust for Jews.

Appropriately, the speech focused on the verse in Isaiah from which the name Yad Vashem (memorial and name) derives – "I will give in my house and within my walls a memorial and a name… I will give them an everlasting name which shall not be cut off."

In an exquisite, almost rabbinically textured sermon, the Pope expounded on the significance of a "name," a spiritual and non-tangible essence that can never be destroyed despite the Nazi enterprise in murdering much of the physical body of Israel.

Many biblical names, the Pope commented, capture the unique legacy of their bearers, but those he singled out, Abraham and Jacob, are particularly poignant for the victims of the Holocaust. Abraham's faith was tested in his willingness to slaughter his son, and Jacob's name was changed to Israel, which in Hebrew means "to contend with God," to memorialize a lonely nocturnal battle with an angel, conveying its outcome – "I have struggled with man and God and prevailed."

Though the Pope may not have consciously intended it, his choice of our named ancestors is charged with the central theological crisis that moral evil of the magnitude of the Shoah represents for divine providence in general and for His unique relationship with the nation of Israel in particular.

Both cases sharply contrast with the fate of the Jewish victims of the Holocaust whose children were slaughtered; in their struggle with man and God, they did not prevail. What the names now come to symbolize is one aspect of Jacob's battle identified by the Pope – "Like Jacob, they were immersed in the struggle to discern the designs of the Almighty."

For me, their names do not offer the comfort and certainty of the basic goodness of humanity we all so crave, but rather forever remind us of a reality we would rather deny – the hate, barbarism and cruelty human beings are capable of and that Jews in particular still confront so historically soon after the radical evil they experienced. Jacob, though victorious, did not emerge from his battle unscathed but permanently disabled, a perpetual reminder of the cost of truly struggling with life and its existential challenges. Equally unsettling is the role of the "Almighty" and His "design" in the face of a Holocaust that would seem to indicate divine powerlessness, not might, and randomness rather than design.

The victims' names, then, signify the struggle for goodness, for faith, for decency, but a struggle that is not always victorious as so many Hollywood endings would have us believe. Only an acknowledgment of this fact of life will serve to realize the Pope's prayer: "May their suffering never be denied, belittled or forgotten!"

Platitudes about the triumph of good over evil are in fact tantamount to denying and belittling the victims' unspeakable ordeal. The Pope articulated an unshakeable faith in God that was shared by many of the Holocaust's victims, but in their shadow, He is no longer a Rock of Ages, but rather the God that Job experienced, of whom, as the Pope declared, "we sometimes find it difficult to grasp His mysterious and inscrutable ways."

Our empathy for the Jewish victims' agony was profoundly deepened by the Pope's recalling what must have been their parents' anticipation when they named them at birth ("What name shall we give this child? What is to become of her?"). At that point, their names represented a future, hopes and aspirations, which we now know were never to materialize, but destined to come to a murderous end.

Finally, the Pope recalled, "The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob is the God of peace." Shalom, the word for peace in Hebrew, is a common salutation, both a hello and a goodbye, and, in the Jewish tradition, an actual name of God. God allowed his most sacred name to be bandied about in the most mundane way to remind us that the divine in fact resides in the greeting, in the acknowledgment of others, in the space where people meet and encounter each other's humanity.

Again, what better way to remember the names of those murdered in the Holocaust than to emphasize a name that they stood for but that their murderers attempted to erase.

Perhaps this provides a response to the most common criticism I have heard – that the Pope never mentioned the Nazis or Germans in his speech. I believe it was a conscious avoidance. The entire thrust of his sermon was to memorialize the names of the Holocaust's Jewish martyrs whose names would in fact be disgraced by mentioning the name of the Holocaust's perpetrators.

The Pope fittingly ended his address in silence, "a silence to remember, a silence to pray, a silence to hope." There is a silence here for everyone, for believers, agnostics and atheists alike. We should be more attuned to the message of these silences that require the listening and patient effort necessary to open ourselves to the voice of the other as the divine name Shalom so ordinarily and yet so extraordinarily expresses.

It is only then that the utopian future envisioned by Isaiah, which began with "yad vashem" will be realized, one in which all humankind will converge in a common universal sanctuary: "For my House shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples."

My own reading of this anticipated future is that the last part of the verse is conditional on the first. No structure – temple, mosque or synagogue – can ever be truly God's "house" as long as its walls are barriers rather than open to all peoples.

U of T professor receives Killam Prize

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Legal theorist and University of Toronto law professor Ernest Weinrib is one of five Canadian university professors awarded the $100,000 Killam Prize for outstanding scholarship in 2009.

McGill University professors François Ricard, Philippe Gros and Wagdi Habashi, along with Queen's University professor John P. Smol, joined Weinrib in accepting the tax-free prizes handed out annually by the Canada Council for the Arts to scholars doing research in engineering, health sciences, natural sciences, social sciences or humanities.

Ernest Weinrib

Weinrib was recognized last month for groundbreaking work in areas of legal reasoning and questions about the relationship between law, freedom and rationality. Combining legal and philosophical analysis, he has been a pioneer in interdisciplinary legal scholarship in Canada.

Considered one of the best legal theorists in North America, Weinrib has written books, essays and articles about legal philosophy, private law and tort law.

While Weinrib is recognized as having a central role in the debates surrounding these areas of law, he is also seen as a controversial figure.

"What I'm interested in is ... understanding the whole nature of liability in terms of law's moral meaning and not just its instrumental use," Weinrib said.

"I approached it in different ways, I examined grounds of liability and worked on the connection between different concepts and structures and the presuppositions of liability."

He said that when he began writing about these areas of law 25 to 30 years ago, the approach to the analysis of private law and tort law served an external, instrumental purpose.

"My view is that it wasn't correct... The idea that [the laws have] moral meaning was controversial then, and in some circles, it still is today."

Weinrib, who has been teaching at U of T for about four decades and is the Cecil A. Wright Professor of Law, said he was thrilled to receive the prestigious award.

"It was very gratifying, but I was also very gratified by the recognition that it implied, not just for my work but for a number of people at University of Toronto who are pursuing a similar line," Weinrib said, giving credit to U of T for playing a leadership role in developing legal theory.

"I'm very grateful to the University of Toronto for providing that environment and grateful to my colleagues," he said, adding that his students also help him hone his skills because they force him to defend and clarify his ideas.

"I've benefited from these institutional advantages."

In addition to having a 40-year relationship with U of T, Weinrib, who said he has an interest in Jewish law, has also developed an ongoing relationship with Tel Aviv University.

He said that for eight out of the last 10 years, he has travelled to Israel after the school year at U of T ends in April to teach a course at TAU.

He said he enjoys the lively legal debates and the personal friendships he has developed, and he called TAU a "leading centre for legal thinking in Israel."

Poet honoured with Jewish studies award

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The 2009 recipient of the Louis Rosenberg Distinguished Service Award from the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS) is poet and professor Seymour Mayne.

The award, established in 2001 by the ACJS, honours an individual, group or association who has made significant contributions to Canadian Jewish studies in one or more fields. In 2008, the award was renamed in tribute to the scholarship of the late Louis Rosenberg.

Seymour Mayne

Mayne, originally from Montreal, is a professor of Canadian literature, Canadian studies and creative writing at the University of Ottawa, where he has taught for "two times chai plus one" years.

He is the author, editor or translator of more than 50 books, and his work is represented in more than 80 national and international anthologies.

Mayne received the award on May 24 at the closing banquet of the day-long "Community Day: Snapshots of the Jewish Canadian Experience" held at Ottawa's Soloway Jewish Community Centre.

"He has contributed to Canadian Jewish literature as a teacher, translator, anthologist, critic, editor, lecturer, community leader and, most importantly, as one of the leading figures in Canadian Jewish poetry.

"Over the course of an immensely productive career, Seymour has garnered many well deserved awards – and his work has been translated into many languages, including French, German, Greek, Hebrew, Italian, Polish, Russian, Spanish and Yiddish – but perhaps none of these marks of esteem as fully and appropriately recognizes the range and impact of his accomplishments as the Louis Rosenberg Award," Pollock said.

In addition to his own work, Mayne has been active in promoting Canadian Jewish studies, and instrumental in founding this city's Vered Jewish Canadian Studies Program in 2006. The program offers a variety of interdisciplinary courses, in both English and French, as well as a minor in Canadian Jewish studies.

"Almost as important to Seymour as his own poetry has been his effort to provide a healthy creative environment... for others, especially for those younger than himself. His encouragement of others through his tireless work as an anthologist, lecturer, editor, translator and, of course, much beloved teacher of literature and creative writing, are all aspects of this calling. The most notable recent example is the establishment in 2006, after years of effort, of the Vered Jewish Canadian Studies Program of which he is founding director. Its aim – to promote an understanding of Jewish life, culture, language, literature, and history in a Canadian context – could hardly be more Seymour-like," Pollock said.

"The Vered Program is a tribute to Sara and her late husband, Zeev, for the vision to establish something unique in Canada," he said.

There is no other program like it in Canada, Mayne added, and it has gained worldwide recognition.

"We are now internationally known... We Canadian Jews suffer from what a lot of Canadians suffer from – an inferiority complex... there are now more scholars doing research on the Jews of Canada [outside the country] than there are in Canada itself... I hope our program will continue to grow from year to year and from generation to generation."

$2M pledge benefits NYGH breast screening clinic

Compiled by CJN Staff

North York General Hospital (NYGH) has announced a $2-million pledge from Charlotte and Lewis Steinberg, enabling it to buy the most advanced mammography technology available.

This state-of-the-art digital mammography with tomosynthesis technology is the latest innovation in breast cancer screening and diagnosis, improving the chances for early detection and identifying breast cancer tumours as small as a few millimetres.

"We are excited to add this technology to our diagnostic capabilities," said Dr. Elizabeth LaMere, chief and medical director of medical imaging.

"In addition to the benefits of digital mammography, tomosynthesis is a technique that has the potential to improve detection of cancers and reduce false positive findings."

Having been approved for use in Canada in March 2009, North York General Hospital is the first Ontario hospital to purchase digital mammography machines with tomosynthesis, which offer improved tumour detection in younger patients and/or patients with dense breasts. The machines are a state-of-the-art Hologic Selenia Dimensions system.

Digital mammography with tomosynthesis complements standard mammograms and digital mammograms as an important tumour diagnostic tool. Research shows the potential benefits to patients include fewer unnecessary biopsies, fewer recalls and faster, more accurate diagnoses.

"This technology is an important step forward in helping to improve early detection of breast tumours, which in turn will help improve quality of care," Lewis Steinberg said. "We are delighted to be able to support North York General Hospital's breast cancer services in this way."

With this gift for the purchase of three digital mammography machines – two with tomosynthesis imaging technology and one with biopsy capability – the Steinbergs have become the largest individual philanthropic donors in North York General Hospital's history.

Charlotte and Lewis Steinberg

"In these turbulent economic times, the Steinbergs generosity inspires us all to embrace the health of our community," said Charles Beall, chair of the North York General Hospital Foundation's board of governors.

Tomosynthesis takes multiple angled low-dose images of the patient's breast in an arc pattern, which are then reconstructed into a series of up to 100 thin (one millimetre), high-resolution slices that can be displayed dynamically, creating a three-dimensional effect. This approach eliminates tissue overlap and noise found in currently employed digital and traditional mammography.

"We are deeply grateful for the continued support and exceptional generosity of Charlotte and Lewis Steinberg," said Bonnie Adamson, the hospital's president and CEO. "Our staff are committed to providing the highest level of care to our patients and their families. This new technology will further enhance our ability to offer superior breast cancer screening and diagnosis."

The three digital mammography machines will be operational by this fall. This additional imaging technique will improve diagnosis and detection of breast cancer for all patients referred to the hospital for assessment, which last year totalled almost 9,000 people.

This includes patients referred by their family physician for routine screening, patients referred through the Ontario Breast Screening Program (OBSP) at the hospital's Branson site, as well as those referred for a diagnostic assessment, encompassing patients referred to the BMO Financial Group Breast Diagnostic Centre, which opened at the hospital's Leslie Street site in 1997.

This centre was one of Canada's first centres for rapid assessment breast patients, offering a multidisciplinary approach to diagnosis of breast cancer.

The Steinbergs have a long history with NYGH and have supported many important programs at the hospital, including the Charlotte and Lewis Steinberg Emergency Department and the genetics program, and have provided funding for the breast services' first sentinel node machines.

Lewis Steinberg said that he and his wife decided the new technology would be a tremendous asset to the hospital and they wanted to do what they could to help. "These are critical times, and a lot of people are cutting back on donations. We hope to be a good example."

In recognition of the Steinbergs gift, North York General Hospital's breast services will be named Karen, Heather and Lynn Steinberg Breast Services.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Poverty called a key determinant of health

to eliminating poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000; and Wendy Wolfman, director of family and community services, Jewish Family & Child.

Rothman said that almost 20 years after Campaign 2000 was established, its mandate is still to "keep the government's feet to the fire. Since 1991, we have made virtually no progress. Things improved and then they got worse again. Clearly, there is work to do."

Poverty is a key determinant of health, she said. "It is a public interest issue because it is harmful to all of us. Poverty costs the government millions of dollars and households thousands of dollars [annually.]

"Our message is that we as a society can pay now and prevent poverty, or pay more later."

"More than 3,000 Jewish children in the GTA live in poverty, and one-third of these [live in households] with a single mother. Poverty does not affect all groups equally."

Rothman said children living in poverty say such things as "'I feel ashamed when my dad can't get a job; I pretend I forget my lunch;' and 'I can't go on school trips.'

"They don't get much opportunity to receive homework help, because many of their parents are working more than one job."

Wolfman said that the 2001 census cited 20,000 Jewish poor, out of which 4,000 were working poor, 10,000 were immigrants, 9,000 were government supported and 3,000 were children.

"We know that children raised in poverty struggle in school, and this causes a cycle of poverty.

"It is important to know that a person who earns $9.50 an hour in a 40-hour week earns $19,760 annually, and that is $2,000 below the poverty line."

She said that JF&CS distributed more than $12 million this past year in direct assistance and camp subsidies, and saw 2,000 clients.

Naomi, a former client, said she went to JF&CS for help when her two children were small and she and her husband were living on one income. "We could barely afford diapers or formula. We received financial help, and we got a Passover food box. It made a difference between us eating and not eating."

Naomi, who now works in the Jewish community, said that without JF&CS, "we wouldn't have survived. My kids had swimming lessons, and we went to parenting classes."

They've now come full circle, Naomi said. "We received help from the Jewish community, and now I work for the Jewish community."

Adler urged the audience to speak out about poverty so that the government will hear. "We [at UJA] can direct you to the proper person in government. If you have someone to open the door for you, you will be heard. You just need the tools to get started.

"Sign a petition calling for the eradication of poverty, write a letter, call a radio talk show, go to a meeting, or call your MPP. Tell the world that there is a poverty problem. You are the voice we can use to move forward." — C.B.

No-frills CJA campaign emphasizes 'the new poor'

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In keeping with the sombre economic times, this year's Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) will be unusually austere. There will be no big-name speakers, fewer cocktail parties, and a consolidation of some events among the divisions.

General chair Ian Karper and women's chair Sandy Martz said the campaign will focus on explaining to donors and potential new contributors how seriously the slump is affecting many in the Montreal Jewish community.

They refer to "the new poor," previously middle class families, who are finding it hard to make their mortgage payments or keep their children in Jewish day schools because of a job loss.

Agence Ometz, a social service agency of Federation CJA, has observed a significant increase in clients who have lost middle management positions, who are in the 35 to 55 age range.

There's also an increased demand for tuition assistance at the Jewish schools, much of it coming from people who never asked for help before, Martz said.

This past year, the federation for the first time begun offering free meals twice a week to anyone who says they need it, and also sponsored several no cost Passover seders in different locations around the city.

Record number of teens attend BBYO convention

Compiled by CJN Staff

A record number of Toronto-area teens boarded the buses to Camp Northland for BBYO's spring regional convention, this year.

With imagination as the weekend's theme, the convention encouraged the teens to enrich their connection to Judaism, sharpen leadership skills and develop strategies for strengthening BBYO, a leading pluralistic Jewish teen movement.

The convention marked the end of a landmark year for BBYO's Lake Ontario region, which saw a large increase in teen involvement. In Toronto alone, membership has increased 25 per cent since the 2007-08 school year, and more than 300 teens from Lake Ontario region were involved in BBYO programs this year. Additionally, nearly 100 Toronto-area middle-school students were involved in Teen Connection, the BBYO program created especially for Jewish pre-high school students, which has helped yield BBYO's largest incoming class of freshmen in years.

> 'No longer community's best kept secret'

"No longer is BBYO the Toronto Jewish community's best kept secret," said BBYO program director Kevin Goodman. "With the launch of three new chapters this year, more teens than ever before are taking advantage of the fun and meaningful experiences that BBYO has been providing to Jewish high school teens for over 80 years."

In addition to setting the agenda for the coming year and electing the 2009-10 Lake Ontario region executive at the convention, participants enjoyed the Sunday awards ceremony where senior Michelle Naftalis was presented with the 17th annual Lake Ontario region award for outstanding BBYO leadership, in memory of Marci Birzon. Also recognized were Maya Feldberg, who received the award for emerging leadership, and members of Chaverot chapter, who won the regional spirit gavel.

Convention co-chairs were incoming presidents Michelle Covant and Michael Gallowitz, who were elected to lead BBYO's 2009-10 regional executive. Also elected were vice-presidents Kelly Indarjit and Eli Krapivnik for programming, Alissa Malina and Josh Harendorf for membership, Michelle Efrosman for communications, and Maya Feldberg and Russel Bahar for service, advocacy and Judaism.

For more information on BBYO in the Greater Toronto Area, contact Kevin Goodman at 416-398-2004, ext. 222, or kgoodman@bbyo.org.

Coast to Coast

Jewish delegation meets with PA President Abbas

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Representatives of the Jewish community met last week with Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas in an "open" dialogue – but one in which little that was new emerged.

Delegates from the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) and other Jewish organizations met with the Palestinian leader and chief negotiator Saeb Erekat in Ottawa during a short visit to Canada. The one-hour meeting – requested by the Palestinians – featured a frank exchange of views, said CIC national chair Moshe Ronen.

Abbas called on the Jewish community to advocate for "a true peace, a just peace," Ronen said. "There was nothing dramatic or new in what he asked. He wanted us to continue dialogue. He wanted Canada to play a role in refugees and he wanted the Jewish community to use its influence to urge the parties to resolve their differences."

A news release issued by the Prime Minister's Office said "Canada believes these issues must be settled between the parties themselves. Canada also remains prepared to assist in the peace process in any way the parties would find useful."

Following a meeting with Abbas – who said he would make settlement expansion a key issue – Cannon called settlement growth "illegal.

"Canada has never supported the expansion of settlements. We believe that it's an illegal move," he said.

Ronen said the CIC believes the settlement issue is a "red herring." Settlements did not prove to be an obstacle in peace talks with Egypt, Jordan or in the withdrawal from Gaza, he said.

Ronen said he met Abbas and senior Palestinian leaders three years ago and noted last week's encounter contained "less rhetoric, especially from Erekat."

The CIC has met with senior Palestinians in the past. "When we visit Israel, we interact from time to time with members of the Palestinian Authority to get an understanding of the position they put forward and to better be able to put together our advocacy and know what they're saying."

He detected a sense of urgency in the Palestinian delegation. "They believe that the Mideast is less important to the Americans, who are engaged elsewhere, and they will lose interest in the peace process" unless Israelis and Palestinians move quickly, Ronen said. "I think [Abbas] is eager to move forward as he's in a position of weakness" vis-a-vis Hamas.

The Jewish participants raised several issues with Abbas, including the failure of the PA to curb incitement and terrorism. They asked whether Abbas would explicitly announce that a two-state solution would mark an end to hostilities and whether he'd accept a Palestinian state that was demilitarized.

"His answers were not totally satisfactory regarding incitement," Ronen said. "He felt the PA is doing as much [as it can] to arrest extremists and that he is acting in full coordination with Israeli security forces. He wants stability in the region and he felt incitement was well under control."

Asked whether one of the two states should be a Jewish state, Abbas said "it's not up to him to define the Israeli state," Ronen reported.

Abbas called the "right of return," which many suspect is a code for swamping Israel with hostile refugees, as a "non-issue...He felt Israel would determine who would enter the country," Ronen said.

Abbas stated he would refer any peace settlement to a public referendum and he predicted 75 per cent support for a resolution, a result that would undermine Hamas.

Joining Ronen in the meeting were Rabbi Reuben Poupko, co-chair of the Canadian Rabbinic Caucus, Marc Gold, president of Federation CJA of Montreal and Eric Maldoff, chair of the Quebec-Israel Committee.

Federation marks 75 years by feting 75 volunteers

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Although it only adopted its current name in 2005, the Jewish Federation of Ottawa has been in existence for 75 years. Formerly known as the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'ir, it has overseen the physical, spiritual and financial welfare of the community for three-quarters of a century.

On May 20, the community came together to honour 75 of its dedicated volunteers, people who have given of their time and effort in a variety of ways to ensure that the needs of their community are met. The 75th Anniversary Volunteer Awards presentation was held at the Joseph and Rose Ages Family Building and was attended by local MP Paul Dewar.

Federation president and CEO Mitchell Bellman said that volunteers "are the true strength of our organization... we are a strong and growing Jewish community 75 years after the Vaad was founded, largely because of our volunteers."

> 'The true strength of our organization'

Bellman said it was extremely hard to decide which 75 people to honour, because there are many deserving individuals in the community. He noted that the award recipients have not only made great contributions personally, but are also representative of the many others who couldn't be named.

Norman Zagerman, a past president of the Vaad Ha'ir, spoke about the history of the community, citing various milestones and noting proudly that the federation "has carried on the tradition that no member of the community will be denied services because of lack of financial means."

The MC for the evening, CBC Radio news producer Laurence Wall, introduced each award recipient with a brief description of the volunteer work he or she has done. Most of the volunteers have been involved in a variety of activities over a lengthy period of time. Several were members of families with a history of extensive volunteer work.

Federation chair Jonathan Freedman, said his own family has been in Ottawa for 120 years.

"Most [immigrants] came to Ottawa penniless, and many have needed the services of our various agencies," he said. "Let us look ahead to the next 75 years and the continued growth and prosperity of this great community of ours."

The names of the volunteers that were honoured will be engraved on a plaque, which will be in the federation offices.

Baycrest Enriching Care Enhancing Knowledge Enlightening Minds

Notice of Annual Meeting

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care
The Baycrest Day Care Centre
Baycrest Hospital
The Jewish Home for the Aged and
The Baycrest Centre Foundation

3560 Bathurst Street, Toronto

June 18, 2009 RSVP:
3 p.m. to 5 p.m. 416 785-2500, ext. 6303

The following by-laws will be presented for approval:

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care	By-law No. 3 - 2009
The Baycrest Day Care Centre	By-law No. 3 - 2009
Baycrest Hospital	By-law No. 3 - 2009
The Jewish Home for the Aged	By-law No. 3 - 2009

Each By-law No. 3 - 2009 of the above corporations enables only elected directors to vote at future meetings of the members. This is in keeping with recommendations of the Auditor General of Ontario regarding hospital governance. By-law No. 3 preserves governors as members but removes their voting power as of July 1, 2009. The quorum required to convene annual meetings is reduced to six voting members. By-law No. 3 confirms that the Investment Committee for each corporation is a joint committee of the corporation and The Baycrest Centre Foundation and that The Baycrest Centre Foundation determines the Investment Committee Chair.

The Baycrest Centre Foundation By-law No. 17

By-law No. 17 replaces the previous Foundation By-law and includes the following changes. References to the Men's Service Group and the Leadership Development Group have been repealed since these groups are now inactive. The composition of the Executive Committee has been expanded to include standing committee Chairs, the President of the Women's Auxiliary, and the Chair of Baycrest. An independent Finance Committee and an independent Audit Committee replace the former Finance and Audit Committee which was joint with Baycrest. The Investment Committee remains a joint committee with a majority of members and its Chair appointed by the Foundation. A new Fundraising Cabinet will report to the Chair of the Donor Development Committee. Board members may now serve an unlimited number of three-year terms in office, subject to nomination by the Governance and Nominations Committee.

Ignatieff praises CJC as being 'conscience of Canada'

"You won't hear that kind of doublespeak from our government ever," he said to a standing ovation.

"I am proud of what our government has done." In reference to Holocaust deniers, he added, "We have placed priority on the advancement of knowledge of history, of [denouncing] anti-Semitism and [advancing] human rights.

Keynote speaker Michael Ignatieff, leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, praised CJC for being the conscience of Canada.

"They have spoken for the larger principle of human solidarity. The best way to protect your own rights is to protect the rights of others."

Ignatieff said Canada cannot be silent when one state denies another state the right to exist. "We must stand with Israel in times of [Israel's] trial."

He told the audience that his rules for life in public office are to listen to everyone and have an open door, "but that does not mean I agree with everyone. We cannot be neutral when historic facts are denied, and we cannot meet with groups that have links to terrorism."

He added that we cannot say one thing in a synagogue and another in a mosque. "My overriding duty is to unite Canadians and define what is legitimate and illegitimate in the Middle East.

"Criticism of Israel is legitimate, but to call it a war criminal [and intimidate] those who defend it is not. Attacks on places of worship and study are never legitimate."

The Middle East conflict provokes passionate disagreement, he said, but it should not cause conflict in Canadian communities. "It shouldn't be turned into a political wedge."

Ignatieff said it is reckless for politicians to win votes by claiming a monopoly on the support of Israel. "I don't want my party to be alone in the defence of Israel. I want all parties to [defend Israel]."

Silvan Shalom, vice-prime minister of Israel and minister for regional development and the development of the Negev and the Galilee, said that since its inception, Israel has not been able to enjoy even one minute of peace and quiet.

"The history of the Jewish people teaches us that Jews were the first to suffer from hatred. We are still engaged in the struggle and we are still in conflict, but today the State of Israel is not engaged alone."

Many people support Israel, he said, "but when I close my eyes and listen to the prime minister of Canada, I think I am in Jerusalem in the Knesset."

Shalom acknowledged that without Canadians and Canadian Jewish Congress, "we couldn't make it. I thank all of CJC for its devotion to Israel."

During the proceedings, Julia and Henry Koschitzky received the Samuel Bronfman Medal for distinguished service to CJC and the Jewish community. It was the first time a couple had been honoured with the award.

In the morning sessions of the plenary, Elizabeth May, leader of the Green Party of Canada, and Jack Layton, MP and leader of the NDP, presented policy statements.

May told the group that her party backs the two-state solution and that the right of Israel to exist is non-negotiable. "Peace and nonviolence are better served by engaging in the region. Governments of the world must keep an eye on [it]," she said.

Asked what role religious groups can play in protecting the environment, May said the essence of responsibility for each other is embedded in creation. "It is important to point out that the values of sharing and respect [are what] move the country forward."

Layton said the core meaning of the word tzedakah is justice. "We must help those less fortunate because it is right. Justice means the end of poverty, the end of genocide, the end of racism.

"Social justice begins at home. We need to start by assisting the least fortunate. The gap between rich and poor has never been wider, and in the depths of this economic crisis, there are 800,000 poor children [in Canada]. Half of all families feel one or two paycheques away from falling into poverty."

In the Middle East, he said, the NDP has a proud tradition of working for peace, and is committed to the right of Israel to exist within secure borders and of the Palestinians to have an independent state with secure borders.

"Here in Canada, we must work together for justice and peace at home and abroad. Let's work together with open hearts and open minds. It is never too late to build a better world."

Among the nine resolutions put forward, the resolution to overturn the approved name change of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, was soundly defeated. That means the name remains Quebec Jewish Congress, a division of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Harper honoured at Wiesenthal benefit

Compiled by CJN Staff

Prime Minister Stephen Harper received the Simon Wiesenthal International Leadership Award from the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC) at its annual Spirit of Hope Benefit in Toronto on Sunday.

Harper, who attended the event along with Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty and numerous other political leaders, received the award for his actions in defence of international human rights and principled stance on issues linked to the Center's mission, the FSWC said in a statement.

"The Simon Wiesenthal International Leadership Award is the highest honour bestowed by our organization and is respectfully named after Simon Wiesenthal, a man who dedicated his life to the pursuit of justice and human rights," said Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean and founder of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles.

"Prime Minister Harper has demonstrated strong moral strength in his actions on the domestic and international levels and in understanding the difficulties of the Jewish people in Canada, Israel and throughout the world."

The award was the second that Harper received on Sunday from a major Jewish organization. Earlier in the day, he accepted the Saul Hayes Human Rights Award from Canadian Jewish Congress at its 29th Plenary Assembly at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto.

More than 2,000 people representing numerous cultural, professional, community and governmental groups gathered at Roy Thomson Hall to show support for the FSWC and raise funds for its 2010 education programs.

"Since 2004, the Spirit of Hope Benefit event has given Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center hope and moral support to help its staff and volunteers deliver quality programs throughout the year," said FSWC chairman Gerald Schwartz, president and CEO of Onex Corporation. "On behalf of the board, I congratulate everyone involved with the organization for harnessing our collective hope and transforming it into consistent action."

"We urged our donors and the broader community to stay committed to our organization during these tough economic times, and the response has been remarkable," Benlolo said. "Our society cannot afford to turn its back on community-based education programs and allow hate, bigotry and anti-Semitism to grow in our communities. This show of support, which included impressive government representation, helps us renew our drive to reach even more people in 2010."

Legion's Wingate Branch gets new president

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Murray Jacobs, 88, is the new president of the Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion

Wingate Branch, originally called the Jewish Brigade, celebrated its 80th anniversary last month.

Jacobs, who now lectures to students at Ontario high schools and universities about his war experiences, joined the army in 1941 when he was 20.

His unit was first stationed at the Horse Palace in downtown Toronto, adjacent to the Ricoh Coliseum. Jacobs remembers being woken up at 5:30 a.m. every morning by a full marching band, which would parade down the halls in the event any soldiers were still in bed. Whenever that happened, "you woke up pretty fast," Jacobs told The CJN.

As he came from a kosher home, it was difficult for him to adjust to eating "treif" army food, which he had to do as there was nothing else available.

Jacobs' unit went through 30 days of basic training and then another 30 days advanced training in Ontario before shipping out overseas to England from Halifax. The unit ended up stationed in the south of England, near the English Channel. The Germans were directly across the channel in France. A mechanic, Jacobs had the job of repairing tanks.

The unit's first mission took place on Juno Beach in Normandy on June 10, 1944, four days after D-Day. Jacobs recalls being strafed by German machine-gun fire during a surprise air raid on the second night. On one occasion, a noon German air raid killed many of his fellow soldiers.

"A lot of people professed to be brave – a lot of them are, a lot of them weren't. But everyone who said they weren't scared, that's an outward lie. Everyone was scared, whether [they] admitted it or not," Jacobs said.

When he and other Canadians landed at Juno and were pushing through the front line, they came across the bodies of some German soldiers, which the Germans had left in their hurry to retreat. The Canadians had to dig trenches to bury the bodies because of the unbearable odour.

"War is hell," Jacobs said. "There's good parts and there's bad parts, but it's hell."

Although it was important for him to maintain his Jewish identity during the war, Jacobs said that he was proud to represent his country and its ideals, especially as he was fighting against an enemy that represented the antithesis of those ideals.

"I was also fiercely proud of being a Canadian. You were living in a country where nobody bothered you, where you could do whatever you wanted to do… and if we didn't start fighting for these rights, we would lose [them]."

But anti-Semitism also ran rampant in Jacobs' own infantry, resulting in more than a few unpleasant incidents. Of the eight Jews in the unit, four had rank, including Jacobs, but that didn't prevent gentile soldiers from being disrespectful toward the Jews. Once, when Jacobs, who was a sergeant, performed inspection, one of the soldiers kicked over Jacobs' mess tray.

He ended up confronting the soldier. "It took me a while to find him," Jacobs said "and we went out. I took my jacket off, and he didn't use those words anymore.

"You're not allowed to hit anybody when you're wearing stripes," Jacobs added. "If I hit him with my jacket on, I could lose my stripes or be severely reprimanded for it."

Comedic author Jonathan Goldstein adds new twist to very old tales

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

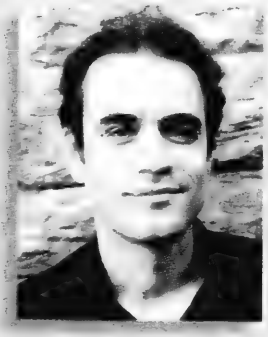
The Bible's Samson is a misguided, brutish lout. Noah? A cantankerous old man on an unappreciated mission. Elsewhere, Adam plays "village idiot" to Eve's intellectual mayoral role in the Garden of Eden.

Sound a little skewed? It should. All of the above stories and others can be found in Jonathan Goldstein's newly released book Ladies and Gentlemen, The Bible! (Penguin Canada), a fictionalized, comedic, and loving take on a selection of some of the more well-known stories from the Old and New Testaments.

Meeting with Heebonics/The CJN for an interview in Toronto on the last leg of his North American book tour before returning to his home in Montreal, Goldstein, 39, said he was amazed at the positive reception to the novel.

Though more well-known lately for his weekly CBC radio show, Wiretap – wherein Goldstein conducts mock phone conversations with characters both real and born out of his fertile, comedic imagination – Goldstein has won accolades for his writing. His first book was 2001's Lenny Bruce Is Dead, and his deceptively simple wit and style are on full display again in Ladies and Gentlemen, The Bible!

The fact is, the book actually started out as a series of radio short stories that Goldstein read on air over the course of his career at CBC and prior to that in his early broadcast days with This American Life on National Public Radio in the United States.



Jonathan Goldstein

But rather than the raft of ill will and complaints one might expect about his artistic tampering with some of the Bible's iconic characters, Goldstein said people have been very accepting of his latest work.

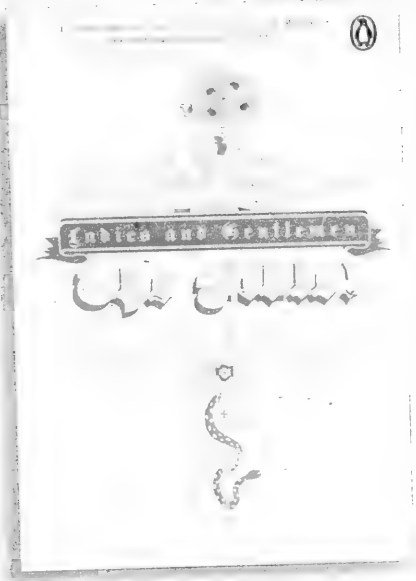
"The beauty of writing stories about characters that people come to the table knowing something about is that you don't have to spend a lot of time with detailed character studies," he said. "Once people hear [the names] Adam and Eve, the stage is set. Then you can manipulate, twist it and thwart expectation."

Goldstein added that on one level, he thought it would be "fun" to write these stories and make for entertaining listening, as well as hold readers' attention.

On another level, however, he said these are some of the "first stories that I learned, that I was told, that are hardwired into my head from an early age."

And the rub on that point, he said, is that the learning wasn't necessarily from the source material itself; namely the Bible. Instead, Goldstein said he seemed to absorb these biblical stories through various media in roundabout ways.

"It was watching Fred and Barney get swallowed by a whale on The Flintstones [or] watching Mel Brooks' [movie] History of the World and seeing what his Moses did with the Ten Commandments. Stuff like that," he said. "I also had a kids' Bible I was obsessed with. There was just so much to dig into that as I started writing these stories... I was digging into a part of my childhood."



Speaking of childhood memories, Goldstein tips his hat to Montreal Jews of a certain vintage in the book's preface, describing a traditional neurotic, chaotic, but ultimately lovable family dinner at "The Grey Derby" – his paean to the now-defunct Brown Derby restaurant, where many a Jewish clan would gather on a weeknight to slurp down pickles, latkas and deli meats.

To his recollection, on the back wall of the restaurant was a huge mural, "not particularly well drawn" of a David and Goliath scene, the former in the act of smiting the latter, he said.

That image served as the basis for his take on David and Goliath in his book, in which Goliath is portrayed as a murderous Philistine who, in addition to killing Jews, likes to taunt them with horrible jokes about their culture, lack of sexual prowess and all manner of childish insults.

Along comes David, an aspiring high-concept comedian, who immediately takes offense to Goliath. Not so much for his homicidal actions against the Jews, but rather for his utter lack of comedic sensibility.

It's a spin only a humorist like Goldstein could devise, and it reads like an expletive-laced Seinfeld episode, albeit in biblical times.

Still, despite the farcical nature of much of the book, Goldstein manages to imbue each story with an element of pathos.

For instance, in his chapter on Noah and the Ark, Goldstein portrays the shipbuilder as a curmudgeonly old coot, constantly insulting his sons, Shem, Japheth and Ham, and calling into question their work ethic.

God ends up speaking to Noah through the whistling in his nostrils and tells him he's going to bring the flood to wipe out the world.

"The whole thing was a big mistake. Except for you. You I like," God's voice says.

Noah builds the ark, convinced of his righteousness and saves his wife, sons and their wives, along with the animals.

Goldstein ends the chapter with Noah enraged at his family for a perceived lack of gratitude at having been saved, while his son, Ham, walks about the boat solemnly, remembering friends and acquaintances lost to the flood before seeking out his wife, Lila, and putting his face in her hair and waiting for the rain to stop.

It's a poignant image that leaves the reader with more questions than answers about the flood and the nature of man.

"I don't know that I set out to particularly write these as funny stories," Goldstein said. "As you start to humanize these characters, as you unpack them and break personalities out of these figures... that's when the humour starts to seep in. When you think, 'Well, what kind of a guy is Noah? Who is crazy enough to listen to the voice of God and not doubt his own sanity.' He has to be a strong character."

Goldstein added: "There are moments of 'funny' [in the book] but I didn't want them to be at the expense of the subject's themes. Still, any time you have the intersection of the sublime... with the human, that's the perfect formula for comedy. Like seeing the face of God in a pancake. It's inherently silly, but human."

While not "religious," Goldstein said that his understanding of a Jew's relationship with God was akin to a wrestling match.

"This book was my way of wrestling."

Ephraim Katzir dies at 93

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Ephraim Katzir, Israel's fourth president and an internationally recognized biophysicist died Saturday at his home in Rehovot, several weeks after his 93rd birthday.

Katzir's tenure, 1973 to 1978, spanned two seminal events in Israeli history: the 1973 Yom Kippur War and the historic visit of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat to Jerusalem in 1977.

He left the presidency after one term to return to scientific research, declining a second term due to his wife's illness.

"Ephraim Katzir was devoted to the State of Israel in all that he did and was a scientific pioneer," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said in a statement. "He also contributed to Israel's security, and his integrity and modesty set an example."

Born in Kiev in 1916, Katzir immigrated at age six with his family to British-ruled Palestine and studied biology at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, receiving his PhD in 1941, according to his official biography on the Foreign Ministry website.

Ephraim Katzir, Israel's fourth president

He served in the Haganah, the underground Jewish defence organization, for which he helped to set up a military research and development unit that developed explosives, propellants and other munitions.

During the war that followed Israel's independence in 1948, he was appointed head of the military's science corps. He served as the Israeli military's chief scientist from 1966 to 1968, the website said.

Katzir was among the founders of Israel's renowned Weizmann Institute of Science and headed its biophysics department, where his work on synthetic protein models deepened understanding of the genetic code and immune responses.

Katzir was awarded the Israel Prize, the country's highest honour, in 1959 for his contribution to the natural sciences. He received the Japan Prize in 1985 for his work on immobilized enzymes used in oral antibiotics. In 1996, the former president was selected as the first Israeli to be invited to join the American Academy of Sciences.

Israel cabinet ministers reject loyalty oath

By BARAK RAVID

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The cabinet ministerial legislative committee rejected on Sunday a bill stating that those who wish to retain Israeli citizenship would have to declare their loyalty to Israel as a Jewish state.

The bill, put forth by the Yisrael Beiteinu party, stated that the oath would include a pledge of loyalty to Israel as a Jewish, Zionist, and democratic state, to its emblems and values, and serving Israel either through military service or through any equivalent alternatives.

Almost all of the committee's members opposed the proposed bill, excluding only Yisrael Beiteinu Knesset members.

Sunday's decision dealt a blow to Yisrael Beitenu, led by Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman. The proposal was central in his election campaign last February. The party finished a strong third by playing on the perceived disloyalty of Israel's Arab citizens, roughly one-fifth of the population.

Although Yisrael Beiteinu officials stressed the bill was aimed at all Israelis, they said it was important given what they described as the anti-Israel behaviour of Israel's Arab citizens during the 2006 Lebanon War, the December-January Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip.

> 'The administration must support the moderates'

Yisrael Beitenu lawmakers can still try to get it through the Knesset as an independent initiative, but it appears to lack majority support.

Minority Affairs Minister Avishay Braverman welcomed the decision, saying that "bills such as this one will not be brought before this government or any future government, and sanity will once again play a role in the governing of the state of Israel.

"The administration must support the moderates and fight the extremists. Opposition to this bill is a necessary step in that direction."

The explanatory notes accompanying the bill stated that Israeli citizens have shown signs of disloyalty to the country, its emblems, and its values in recent years, and are dodging military service and national service.

On Saturday, the Higher Arab monitoring Committee, comprising Israeli Arabs, issued an urgent letter to President Shimon Peres, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and to Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin, warning of the possible ramifications of recent legislation proposals made by right-wing MKs, including the loyalty oath bill.

According to the letters, this legislation could have "grave and existential" consequences for Israel's Arabs.

The committee convened an emergency meeting on Saturday in response to a recent spate of legislation the committee has described as "racist and fascist" and aimed against Israel's Arab public.

The legislation includes a bill to outlaw the mourning of the Nakba, or catastrophe, of the displacement of hundreds of thousands of Arabs from Israel on the day of Israel's establishment.

Another bill, which has already gained initial Knesset approval, aims to make it a crime to publicly deny Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state.

UN probe of Gaza war to begin

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United Nations said a team of independent experts mandated to probe alleged war crimes in Israel and Gaza was to leave for the Middle East over the past weekend.

UN spokesperson Rolando Gomez said the mission, led by veteran prosecutor Richard Goldstone, was expected to start its work this week.

Gomez told reporters in Geneva Friday that Goldstone has repeatedly asked the Israeli government to co-operate with his mission.

Israel said Friday that it will not cooperate with a United Nations team appointed to investigate alleged war crimes committed during its 22-day offensive in Gaza.

"This committee has been instructed to find Israel guilty no matter what, and there is no point in co-operating with such a masquerade," said Foreign Ministry spokesperson Yigal Palmor.

Israel and other countries, such as Canada, have accused the UN Human Rights Council – which mandated the fact-finding mission in a January resolution passed by 33 in favour, one against and 13 abstentions – of overtly singling it out.

The resolution that gave the UN team its mandate "is profoundly biased," Palmor said, pointing out that it has only ordered a probe into alleged Israeli violations, while ignoring Hamas, the radical Islamist movement ruling Gaza.

Israel launched the Dec. 27 to Jan. 18 offensive in Gaza in response to rocket attacks by Palestinian militants from the coastal salient at its southern towns and villages.

Israel has described the probe as intrinsically flawed because it was ordered by the 47-member UN Human Rights Council, which has an anti-Israeli track record.

Goldstone has indicated that he will attempt to enter Gaza via Egypt if not allowed in through Israel.

He also said that he wants his team to examine both sides of the December/January conflict.

Israel Briefs

Israel's collapse predicted

The two-state solution will cause the collapse of Israel, the Palestinian Authority's ambassador to Lebanon said in an interview. "With the two-state solution, in my opinion, Israel will collapse because if they get out of Jerusalem, what will become of all the talk about the Promised Land and the Chosen People?" Abbas Zaki told Lebanon's ANB TV. "What will become of all the sacrifices they made, just to be told to leave? They consider Jerusalem to have a spiritual status. The Jews consider Judea and Samaria to be their historic dream. If the Jews leave those places, the Zionist idea will begin to collapse. It will regress of its own accord. Then we will move forward," he said in the May 7 interview, which was translated by MEMRI-The Middle East Media Research Institute. "What is needed is a settlement, not a hudna [truce]," he said. "After 45 years of struggle, we have the right to reach a conclusion to this conflict, rather than extending the hudna, enabling Israel to expand on a daily basis."

Latin American denials

Venezuela and Bolivia denied an accusation in an Israeli government report that they're supplying uranium to Iran for its nuclear program. The secret Israeli document containing the allegation was prepared in advance of Deputy Foreign Minister Danny Ayalon's visit to a conference of the Organization of American States in Honduras. But Bolivia said it doesn't produce uranium, with presidential minister Juan Ramón Quintana calling the report nonsense, the New York Times reported. President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela said in the Times that it was another accusation meant to tarnish his government. The Israeli document cites previous Israeli intelligence conclusions in stating that the two countries are providing uranium to Iran. It didn't say where the uranium originated. The report said Bolivia has uranium deposits, while Venezuela has an estimated 50,000 tons of untapped uranium reserves that reportedly it's not mining currently. Both countries recently cut diplomatic ties with Israel.

Soldier returns cash

A soldier who stole a credit card from a Palestinian home during Israel's military operation in Gaza returned the money with interest. The soldier used the card to withdraw about $400. He was charged last week with looting and pleaded guilty to the theft. A few days after the theft, the Palestinian lodged a complaint. His trial was scheduled to begin last week.

No settlement growth: U.S. administration

The Obama administration wants a complete stop to settlement expansion, Hillary Rodham Clinton said. The U.S. secretary of state's remarks after a meeting with her Egyptian counterpart were unusually blunt and far-reaching. "With respect to settlements, the president was very clear," she said. "He wants to see a stop to settlements – not some settlements, not outposts, not natural growth exceptions. We think it is in the best interests of the effort that we are engaged in that settlement expansion cease. That is what we have communicated very clearly, not only to the Israelis but to the Palestinians and others. And we intend to press that point." U.S. officials until now have not explicitly called for an end to "natural growth" and have tacitly approved "vertical growth," or the addition of rooms and apartments within settlement confines to accommodate growing families. Israeli government officials insist that "natural growth" will continue.

Amos Elon dies

Amos Elon, the distinguished Israeli essayist and historian, died at his home in Tuscany. Elon's wife, Beth, told the New York Times that he died May 25 from leukemia at age 82. Elon, one of Israel's most distinguished essayists and historians, was born in Vienna in 1926 and moved with his family to Palestine in 1933. The author of nine books, Elon also was a longtime correspondent and columnist for the Israeli daily Ha'aretz. His most recent book was The Pity of It All, a history of German Jewry from the 18th century until the rise of Hitler.

Election of new president poses dilemma for South African Jews

By MOIRA SCHNEIDER AND URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

When it became clear that the African National Congress had coasted to another victory in South African elections last month, Jewish community officials reacted differently than some of the community's rank and file.

Michael Bagraim, the president of the Jewish community's umbrella organization, the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, told JTA that his group's relationship with the president-elect, Jacob Zuma, had "always been good." He also noted that South African Jews voted for "every single political party."

But with more than 80 per cent of the country's Jews supporting the opposition party, the Democratic Alliance, many community members highlighted the ANC's problematic record on Israel.

In a country dominated by a single political party – the ANC, which began as the black liberation movement and has won every election in the country since the end of apartheid in 1994 – South African Jews are faced with a dilemma.

"Do they engage in an aggressive campaign against the ANC when they condemn Israel and Jews, or do they try to curry favour with the government in the hope that in the long run itserves our interests?" asked one Jewish South African activist who spoke to JTA on condition of anonymity. "The Board of Deputies has taken the latter approach in order to secure Jewish rights in South Africa."

Jewish reaction to Zuma's election as president underscores the delicate balancing act that Jews in this shrinking community must practise concerning a political party many find hostile to some major Jewish concerns.

Hailed by blacks as the party of liberation, the ANC also has a long history of anti-Israel activity.

Last year, the ANC was a signatory to a statement that described Israel as an apartheid state whose very birth was illegitimate. Some in the ANC, which is allied with an anti-Israel trade union party and the country's Communist Party, favour cutting ties with Israel and subjecting the Jewish state to a trade embargo.

At the ANC congress in Polokwane, South African, at the end of 2007, at which Zuma defeated Thabo Mbeki in a fierce battle for the party's presidency, the ANC passed a resolution widely seen as anti-Israel.

Analysis

Yet despite the overwhelming Jewish vote against the ANC, Jewish community officials have taken pains to say publicly that they see Zuma as being responsive to Jewish concerns.

At a meeting last September with leaders of the Board of Deputies, Zuma said that while there indeed are individuals within the ANC who favour adopting a harsher line toward Israel, the ANC remained in favour of a negotiated two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict rather than Israel's elimination. After the meeting, he issued a public letter to that effect.

But Zuma also denied that the Polokwane resolution was anti-Israel, saying, "It was a resolution specifically on Palestine and solidarity with the Palestinian people given our historical relations."

While the ANC's victory in April was the latest in an unbroken string, the election did mark something of a break with the past. For one, the ANC's vote total declined for the first time. Also, the party also lost a province, the Western Cape, to the opposition and failed to keep the two-thirds majority it had in parliament.

Zuma himself is also unlike previous ANC leaders. While his predecessors, notably Mbeki and Nelson Mandela, hailed from the black elite, which had some relationships with Jews, Zuma comes from different stock. He was born in rural Zululand, never finished high school and has multiple wives.

He's also been a controversial figure in South Africa. In 2005, Zuma was charged with rape. He was acquitted.

Zuma's record on Jewish issues is not long. In June 2007, he sent a letter to the fundraising dinner of the End Israeli Occupation Campaign that condemned the West Bank security fence as an "apartheid wall" that aims to extend Israel's borders, "imprison large sections of the Palestinian population into ghetto prisons, is calculated to destroy Palestinian family and economic life, and entrap a whole nation into a life of poverty and dispossession."

Yet the Board of Deputies says Zuma has been warm toward the Jewish community. Bagraim said he met with Zuma shortly before the elections and that Zuma told him he was interested in visiting the Jewish community in Cape Town soon after the vote.

"It's almost a Mandela-type approach: we hug him when we see him," Bagraim said of Zuma. "He's very open to discussing anything. I think he'll be a greater friend than Mbeki."

Privately, some South African Jews say the best they can hope for is that this government won't take any major steps to alter ties to Israel.

While the Board of Deputies has complained about the ANC's pro-Palestinian stance, Bagraim said that "unbalanced" statements on Israel in the 14 years since the country's transition to democracy mostly have come from the ANC, not the government itself.

When a deputy foreign minister, Fatima Hajaig, told a pro-Palestinian rally in January that "the control of America, just like the control of most western countries, is in the hands of Jewish money," then-South African president Kgalema Motlanthe met with Jewish officials to assure them that everything would be done to ensure the community's safety.

Milton Shain, a professor of history and the director of the Kaplan Centre for Jewish Studies and Research at the University of Cape Town, said the ANC is not anti-Semitic.

"In the ANC, there's a broad antipathy to all forms of racism, including anti-Semitism," he said.

Daniel Mackintosh, a 24-year-old law student, said there is a great deal of unjustified fear-mongering in the Jewish community about the government.

"I think South African Jews are going to continue to be amongst the most prosperous and happy groups in the country for the next five years," he said.

Italian Jews launch national publication

JTA

ROME — The Italian Jewish community launched a national publication aimed at promoting broader public awareness of Jewish life, traditions and culture.

The first edition of Pagine Ebraiche, or Jewish Pages, a 48-page tabloid, was printed this month. It's being published by the Union of Italian Jewish Communities.

Jewish Pages was launched at the annual Turin Book Fair, where thousands of free copies were distributed. The publication includes news, commentary, interviews, book reviews and arts coverage.

The union said the bimonthly publication, the first of its type and scope in Italy, would supplement the magazines now being published by local Jewish communities in several cities, as well as the growing number of Italian Jewish websites, including the Union's flagship information portal, www.moked.it.

Some 30,000 to 35,000 Jews live in Italy, most of them in Rome and Milan.

New groups learning to advocate for Israel

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

BARCELONA — On the top floor of this city's Jewish community centre, a group whose ancestors were cut off from the Jewish People more than 500 years ago are receiving tips and training to become pro-Israel advocates in the 21st century.

"We can use cyberspace to circumvent the traditional media," Raanan Gissin, a former Israeli government spokesperson, tells them.

His voice rises with excitement as he outlines the potential for co-ordinated pro-Israel messaging through blogs and websites.

Listening intently, scribbling notes and asking questions is a group of what might appear to be an unlikely band of foot soldiers for Israel advocacy: the descendants of Jews who converted to Catholicism in Spain and Portugal in the Middle Ages during the Inquisition.

They have travelled from small towns and cities across the Iberian Peninsula to Barcelona for a three-day conference to learn more about their Jewish roots. Amid talks on Jewish history, theology and identity these people – known as Marranos or Anusim, Hebrew for "the forced" – also learned how they could be voices for Israel in their communities.

Anti-Israel sentiment runs particularly high in Spain, where the mass media tend to provide highly critical reporting on Israel, and public opinion surveys suggest hostile attitudes toward Jews and Israel. Several top Israeli military commanders are being charged by Spain's high court for possible war crimes for their authorization of the bombing of a Gaza apartment bloc in 2002 that killed a top Hamas commander and 14 civilians.

"Spain is one of the most difficult countries in terms of Israel's image, and the Anusim see and feel it on a daily basis," said Michael Freund, chair of Shavei Israel, which organized the seminar.

Shavei Yisrael reaches out to so-called "lost Jews" around the world who seek to know more about their heritage.

"Many of them have expressed a desire to do something about it, to speak out about it, to speak on Israel's behalf," Freund said.

"I think the potential is vast for Israel and the Jewish People because the Anusim – because of their personal background and historical connection with the Jewish People – feel an affinity to Israel, and they are perfectly positioned as citizens of Spain and Portugal to serve as unofficial ambassadors," he said. "I think it's time for the State of Israel to realize that and to make use of the goodwill that exists here."

Several of the 60 people attending the conference have already become involved. Some said they were afraid of facing anti-Israeli sentiment in their hometowns.

A middle-aged doctor from Barcelona, who preferred not to have his name used, said he was threatened by a local Muslim in response to articles he wrote under a pseudonym, defending Israel.

"Israel is considered a criminal state, and people are always looking to see how they can further frame Israel," he said. "I fear officials in Israel do not view Europe importantly enough and that's a mistake. We have to change the mentality here."

In recent years, Spain's centuries-old anti-Semitism based on religious dogma has taken a new form in anti-Israel sentiment, he said.

Einat Kranz-Nieger, the deputy chief of mission at the Israeli Embassy in Madrid, outlined some of the major ideas Israel is trying to transmit internationally: its commitment to the Israeli-Palestinian peace effort, the need to improve Palestinians' security and standard of living, and the global and regional threat posed by Iran.

In a tense moment in the discussion, several participants mentioned the potential risks they face in speaking out for Israel and asked whether Israel would assist them if necessary. They did not receive a clear answer.

Seminar organizers said their comments underscore the sensitivity of those seeking some sort of return to Judaism, whether through official conversion or a connection with local Jews.

"People feel they live in a gray zone," said Rabbi Eliyahu Birnbaum of Shavei Yisrael. "They are not officially Jews, but some are identifying themselves as Jews in very non-Jewish communities."

Estimates for the number of people with Jewish roots in this region vary. Many Spanish and Portuguese have family names that indicate a Jewish past. Some at the conference spoke of families observing unexplained traditions such as lighting candles followed by a grandmother's mumbling of unintelligible incantations, or the washing and salting of meat.

According to a recent genetic study, about 20 per cent of Portuguese and Spanish citizens have Jewish backgrounds.

Rafael Peretz, 47, is from the town of Saragossa, about 150 miles west of Barcelona, where only three Jewish families live. He recently started a website about Anusim, Kolisraelorg.net, which features a section on Israeli advocacy. There are links to several Spanish-language pro-Israel bloggers, and Peretz sends messages on online social networking sites and posts videos on the video-sharing site YouTube to help get out what he calls more balanced information on Israel.

"In Spain, there is not much information about the reality of life in Israel," said Peretz, who started investigating his Jewish roots several years ago.

When Peretz was a child, his father had brought him to a synagogue and startled him with the announcement: "We come from the Jewish People."

At the seminar, Gissin said that one must think creatively in order to advocate for Israel successfully.

"You have to learn how to fight, how to speak – short sentences, use stories," he said.

Gazing around the room, Gissin said, "You are a living testament to what we are talking about. Each of your stories is a living document to the eternity of the Jewish People."

Gang leader confesses to killing Halimi

JTA

PARIS — The head of a gang accused of murdering French Jew Ilan Halimi confessed, but it is still unclear who inflicted the fatal injuries.

"You know very well I was the one who did it," Youssouf Fofana told a French court May 28, in reference to the 2006 kidnapping, torture and murder of Halimi, who was 23 years old.

His statement was reported to journalists by judicial sources, since the press is not allowed access to the trial because of the juvenile status of two suspects at the time of the crime.

Fofana headed a gang called the Barbarians, accused of capturing and torturing Halimi for three weeks before he was found near death on Feb. 13, 2006. Some of the 27 suspects, including Fofana, are also charged with acting out of anti-Semitic motives.

In the coming weeks, judges will try to determine which suspects dealt lethal blows to their captive. Fofana said during his court appearance that he covered Halimi with a flammable liquid before lighting him on fire, in addition to stabbing him over the course of the kidnapping, news reports indicate.

However, the next day, a contrasting version of events told by police officers suggested that two other suspects may have been responsible for taking the bound Halimi to a nearby wood, burning him alive and leaving him for dead, according to a report in the French daily Liberation.

The police testimony was based on Fofana's initial version of the crime, told to authorities in 2006, said Liberation, which gathered its information from anonymous judicial sources.

Halimi was found barely alive, naked and bound, near a southern Paris subway rail line. He died hours later.

Price of oil dictating shape of new economy, says Rubin

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It's all about oil, says Jeff Rubin, one of Canada's leading economists.

Best known for his work on global energy markets and his prescient forecast that oil prices would skyrocket, Rubin has just written a book about the shape of the future international economy.

In Why Your World Is About To Get A Whole Lot Smaller: Oil and the End of Globalization (Random House Canada), he brings bad news and good news.

As supplies dwindle and demand jumps, he expects the price of oil in Canada to rise to $2 or perhaps even to $2.50 per litre within two or three years.

"There is no such thing as cheap oil," said Rubin, who recently resigned as chief economist of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. "Oil might be less expensive in the middle of the recession, but it will never be cheap again."

But as punishing oil prices jolt the economy and reverse the trend toward globalization, long lost local economies will re-emerge and the world will become a greener, more environmentally sustainable place, he said in an interview last week at his publisher's office.

If you think that Rubin is dreaming or making it up as he goes along, consider the fact that he established a credible track record as an economic guru on the strength of another successful prediction.

Rubin, who holds degrees from the University of Toronto and McGill University, correctly warned financial markets back in 1989 that Toronto real estate values would decline by 25 per cent.

He figured that the housing market was long overdue for a correction because the federal government wanted to curb inflation, which was being fuelled by the spiralling cost of residential homes.

Rubin, too, was instrumental in influencing government policy.

When he called for the Goods and Services tax to be set at seven per cent instead of the original 10 per cent, the finance minister of the day was hardly pleased.

Nor was Rubin's boss happy with his recommendation. "I was almost fired," said Rubin, who was CIBC's chief economist for 17 years.

Rubin, 54, the son of a research director of a Canadian industrial lab, began to think seriously about carbon emissions when he concluded that oil is anything but a finite resource.

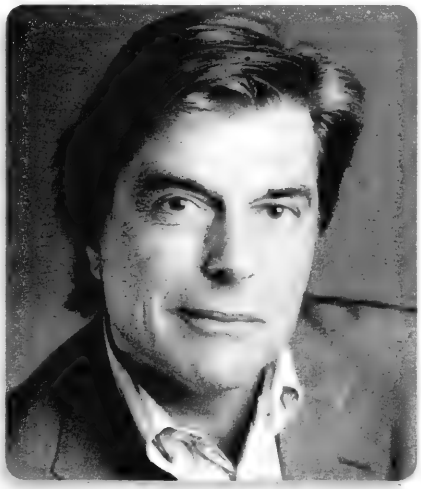
"I hooked up with people who were familiar with the issue of depletion," he explained.

In his easily accessible and cogently argued book, he sets out his central argument:

"The world's oil wells are running out of the stuff that keeps the whole system going. Every well will eventually run dry ... Even with the most advanced technology, oil companies get barely half of the oil out before geophysics and economics conspire to make what's left not worth going after."

Take the United States, for example.

Since the 1970s, U.S. oil production has been halved, from 10 million barrels a day to five million today.



Jeff Rubin

Yet, as oil consumption has risen from 15 million barrels a day in 1970 to almost 20 million today, Americans are burning more oil than ever.

The conclusion is inescapable, at least according to Rubin.

"We are not going to wake up tomorrow and find that the world's oil wells have run dry," he writes. "But we will face the dawning realization that there is a little less each day, and that what remains will cost more to burn.

"Eventually, we will face the wrenching choice between adapting to the realities of a new, smaller world or clinging to the artifacts of an old world we can no longer have."

Fleshing out this theme, Rubin observed, "Triple-digit oil prices will render the global economy obsolete and revitalize local economies. Hence, our world will become smaller and greener."

On the most basic level, American winter fruits may become exorbitantly expensive and therefore out of reach to the average Canadian.

"We won't be eating California oranges in January," he said. "We'll have to be satisfied with Canadian apples. We'll have to adjust our diets."

Frozen lamb chops from New Zealand will also be affected by the coming changes, he noted.

"It burns too much oil to shlep New Zealand lamb to Canada. Distance costs money and produces carbon emissions."

As far as the consumption of food is concerned, Rubin believes that the brave new world is already upon us.

"I see this happening very quickly. In my neighbourhood, we see only locally grown produce."

He added, "Food imports will become less and less important. Last year, the United States bought $6 billion worth of food from China. That's not tenable anymore."

Chinese steel exports will also take a hit, with the result that rust-belt jobs in the United States will return, he pointed out.

Soaring oil prices will have an impact on real estate as well.

If gas costs $7 a gallon in the United States, commuters from the suburbs will frantically look for homes in the city, where prices will rise correspondingly.

Cities will become more densely populated and suburbs may yet be converted back to farm lands.

"Urban sprawl doesn't make sense anymore," he said.

The auto industry, already reeling from falling demand and higher prices at the pump, will shrink in this harsh economic environment.

"Detroit makes twice as many cars as we need. There are 248 million vehicles on the road in the United States at the moment. Twenty per cent will be yanked off the roads as people stop driving. The message is – get off the road. That's where the market is taking us."

In a smaller world, the ordinary Canadian may cancel a cycling trip to Tuscany and opt for a vacation in Muskoka or the Catskills instead.

"We won't travel around so much, and some destinations will definitely suffer. It'll have a beneficial effect on the environment. We'll have a more greener world. We won't go green because of some moral commitment, but because the market will lead us there."

Rubin's timely book has struck a chord, having also been published in the United States and Britain. In addition, German and Croatian language rights have been sold.

Having reinvented himself as a writer and speaker, Rubin intends to write more books.

In his next one, he hopes to explore themes he merely touched upon in his current volume.

As he put it, "I never run out of stuff to say."

Montreal writer wins top Canadian Jewish Book prize

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

It is not a glittering gala event like the Giller Prize, nor does it carry the gravitas of the Governor General's Awards, but the Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards ceremony – which was held May 25 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre in downtown Toronto – is the Jewish community's annual reaffirmation of its strong commitment to homegrown Jewish literature.

Attended by more than 200 people, the 21st annual awards ceremony honoured eight authors who came from Victoria, Brandon, Montreal and New York, as well as Toronto, to receive their prizes. The winning titles were chosen from a pool of more than 100 submissions by Canadian authors or permanent residents, published in 2008 and reflecting Jewish themes or significant Jewish content.

The top fiction prize went to Ami Sands Brodoff of Montreal for her novel The White Space Between, a Holocaust-related tale that explores a mother-daughter relationship against the backdrop of modern Montreal. The novel is published by Toronto-based Second Story Press, which also produced The Diary of Laura's Twin by Toronto author Kathy Kacer, the winner in the youth literature category.

For Kacer, it was an extraordinary moment – the culmination of a week in which she won two other major literary prizes, a U.S. Jewish Book Council award for The Diary of Laura's Twin and a Yad Vashem award for children's Holocaust literature for Hiding Edith, one of her nine previous books. "It's been a good week," she told The CJN. "I've been overwhelmed with awards. I kind of pinch myself every day."

Barrie Wilson, the Toronto author who took the history prize for How Jesus Became Christian (Random House Canada) explained that the book arose as a result of his intellectual explorations into early Christianity, as well as his personal experiences as a former Anglican married to a Jewish woman, who eventually converted to Judaism. "As part of that conversion experience, I learned how Jewish Jesus was and how non-Jewish Paul was," he said. "I found that the religion of Paul sideswiped the religion of Jesus, and I looked at the true roots of Christian anti-Semitism."

Correction

As the result of an editing error, the story "Vancouver musician pays tribute to Pete Seeger" (CJN, May 21) incorrectly referred to Camp Naivelt as Zionist. Camp Naivelt is a secular, family-oriented camp. We apologize for the error.

For Isa Milman, it was a visit to an old Jewish cemetery in Lipton, Sask., that set her on the "wondrous journey" that resulted in Prairie Kaddish (Coteau Books), which took the poetry prize. The poems therein took her four years to write, the Victoria-based poet, who is a child of Holocaust survivors, told The CJN. "From the moment I stepped into that Lipton cemetery, I was hooked. I knew I had to pursue this."

Yet another prize-winning title centrally informed by the Holocaust was Gratitude (Penguin Canada), by Joseph Kertes, who won the prize in Holocaust literature for his rich tale set in a Hungarian village in 1944. "It was a subject I was trying to avoid most of my life," he said. "It was something I ran from, in a sense, and yet it raised itself up to me quite frequently. . . . I had to go to rooms in my mind that I didn't want to – dark rooms – and yet they were always there. So it took me many years to both run from and execute this work."

In accepting his prize in biography and memoir, Peter C. Newman – the legendary Canadian author whose most recent work is Izzy : The Passionate Life and Turbulent Times of Izzy Asper, Canada's Media Mogul (Harper Collins Canada) – gave an expansive speech about the late Asper's many remarkable qualities, including his generosity as a philanthropist, sharp sense of humour, and tendency to play bizarre practical jokes. "I've written about a lot of Canadians in my books, but Izzy was the most interesting," Newman commented. "Why? Because he was a mensch, in every sense of the word."

For scholarship on a Jewish subject, the prize went to Reinhold Kramer for Mordecai Richler: Leaving St. Urbain (McGill-Queen's), which may be the strongest biographical work on Richler yet published. "I realized that all I had to do was read a few of his books and put a few of his words together," said the author, a professor of English at Brandon University. "You don't even have to be a great writer. Because Richler is so good, if you pulled a few things together you could end up with a good book."

David Roskies won the prize for Yiddish literature for Yiddishlands (Wayne State University Press), which is in part a memoir of his mother, Masha, a formidable force in the Montreal Yiddish community, and her circle of Yiddishists and intellectuals; it is also a vibrant portrait of how Jewish culture was transported from eastern Europe to Montreal. Roskies concluded his acceptance speech by singing a Yiddish song from his late mother's repertoire that was first sung in Vilna in 1919.

What goes into the making of a book?, The CJN asked Roskies. "Well, it has to be a book that you have to write," he replied. "So once you throw yourself into it, it takes over your life: that's what happened to me. I spent two years writing this book, basically day and night – which is to say, when you're not actually writing it, you're thinking it. In my case, I started writing this book the day I got up from shivah after my mother died. It was a book I knew I would have to write some day, but I couldn't write it so long as she was alive."

For the first time, the 21-year-old awards ceremony was held in a downtown location rather than in its previous home in the Leah Posluns Theatre in North York. Although the seats seemed less comfortable and the post-ceremony reception overcrowded in the smaller lobby, the event was well attended and by all indications a success.

The only serious disappointment was that an appearance by famed detective novelist Howard Engel had to be postponed due to illness. Engel, who was to receive a lifetime achievement award, assured The CJN by telephone that he is looking forward to the honour at a future date.

AUTHOR OF HOW JESUS BECAME CHRISTIAN AT BETH DAVID ON JUNE 3

Prof. Barrie Wilson, who recently won a Jewish Book Award in history, will speak about his groundbreaking and controversial book, How Jesus Became Christian, at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am. The book contends that the religion of the apostle Paul displaced the teachings of Jesus so that Paul's preaching about a divine gentile Christ covered up the real Jesus and provided the basis for Christian anti-Semitism.

Names in the News: Lola Rasminsky's uncomfortable feeling that only children from well-off families could afford art classes led her to offer free instruction in the arts for 40,000 children in Toronto's under-served neighbourhoods. Her efforts have earned her the Canadian Urban Institute's 2009 Local Hero Award, to be presented this week at a ceremony at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel.

Rasminsky is founder of the Avenue Road Arts School and the non-profit group Art for Children (now Arts for Children and Youth). "The lesson is that we have no idea how gifted and capable a lot of our young people are," she said. "Too often we only see a negative side of youth. I believe that if more at-risk youth were given a chance to develop their talents, we'd have safer cities. Engaging youth in art-making really does make a difference to our entire city."

ABRAHAM'S GATE, FEATURING WORLD'S EARLIEST ARCHES, IS RESTORED AT TEL DAN RESERVE

After extensive restoration work by Israel's Nature and National Parks Protection Authority, the 4,000-year-old Abraham's Gate at the Tel Dan Nature Reserve in northern Israel has been reopened to the public.

Composed of sun-dried mud brick on a foundation of large basalt stones, Abraham's Gate was first uncovered almost 40 years ago and has been restored to its original height of 22 feet. The gate serves as a link between the two towers below its arches, the earliest complete arches ever found in the world.

"Abraham's Gate is truly one of Israel's most coveted and significant historical treasures," says Oded Grofman, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada. "The reopening of Abraham's Gate is sure to add some extra excitement for visitors to Israel this summer."

Visitors to the Tel Dan Nature Reserve may also explore three different hiking routes and an archeological site featuring the remains of the biblical city of Laish. For details, please visit www.goisrael.ca.

New hotel in Tel Aviv

Travellers to Israel this spring may stay in one of the country's most artistically imaginative hotels. The Art + Hotel in Tel Aviv. The public areas of the Art + Hotel feature artworks, including huge murals and video art, by Zadok Ben David, Sigalit Landau, Maya Attoun and other leading Israeli artists. Retro-style furniture and modern design have been combined to create the cool atmosphere that the art scene in Tel Aviv enjoys. Israeli art is also exhibited in a 400-square-metre gallery.

Guests may partake of a rich Israeli breakfast in the library and watch the sun set over the Mediterranean from a rooftop deck. With 62 guest rooms, the hotel is a short walk from the veteran art galleries on Gordon Street and a short cab ride from the many new art galleries in southern Tel Aviv and Jaffa. www.atlas.co.il

Ancient marble statue unearthed

An 1,800-year-old marble figurine depicting the head of a bearded man was recently uncovered during archeological excavations in Jerusalem's City of David.

The statue is believed to be from the Roman Empire around the time of the Emperor Hadrian between the 2nd and 3rd centuries. The figure's short hairstyle, prominent lobes, curved ears and almond-shaped eyes suggest the object most likely portrays an athlete.

"The level of finish on the figurine is extraordinary, while meticulously adhering to the tiniest of details," said Dr. Doron Ben-Ami of the Israel Antiquities Authority. "No similar artifact made of marble bearing the same image has been discovered in excavations anywhere else in the country."

Travellers to the City of David may explore the site's visitor centre, 3-D exhibition and guided tours through the excavations that include Warren's Shaft and ancient water systems such as Hezekiah's Tunnel and the Second Temple Shiloah pool. For more on the excavations, please visit www.cityofdavid.org.il. For more on travel to Israel, please visit www.goisrael.ca.

EXHIBITION

Joshua Neustein: Margins

Contemporary art unraveling the Dead Sea Scrolls.
Opening June 27 | Royal Ontario Museum

Concurrent with the Royal Ontario Museum's exhibition Dead Sea Scrolls: Words that Changed the World, Margins is a newly commissioned installation by New York-based artist Joshua Neustein, exploring themes and ideas suggested by the Scrolls. Using materials such as glass and soot, as well as drawing, sculptural and textual elements, Neustein's work engages visual art in a poetic reflection on writing and religion.

Presented by the Koffler Gallery and the Institute for Contemporary Culture at the Royal Ontario Museum

A sweeping survey of Jews in Greece

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Jews have lived in Greece since time immemorial, yet strangely enough, there was "no such thing as a Greek Jew" until the 20th century, according to K.E. Fleming, the author of Greece – A Jewish History (Princeton University Press).

The anomaly is easily explained, writes Fleming, a professor of Mediterranean and modern Greek history at New York University and the director of its Hellenic Studies program.

K.E. Fleming

Greece, in terms of its borders, was a geographical work in progress until after World War II, since much of its territory was occupied by the Ottoman Empire and various European powers.

Salonika, which had the largest Jewish community in Greece prior to the Holocaust, was ceded to Greece in 1912. Thessaly, Epirus, Macedonia and Thrace passed into Greek hands between 1881 and 1920. Crete became Greek in 1913, while the Ionian islands were incorporated in 1864. Rhodes and the Dodecanese islands joined Greece in 1947.

Jews as a national group with a distinct Greek identity were officially recognized by Greece only after World War I, says Fleming, whose scholarly, deeply researched book is billed as the first comprehensive English-language account of Greek Jews.

Under a law adopted in 1920, Jews were recognized as a protected minority and, for the first time, were regarded as Greek Jews per se. The Greek government, in a campaign of Hellenization, began funding Greek language classes at Jewish schools in Salonika. By the 1930s, young Jews invariably spoke Greek rather than Ladino.

"With the cultural assimilation of thousands of Jews, a true Greek Jewish culture took root," writes Fleming.

At its heart, Fleming's book is a story of integration, exclusion, tragedy, dispersal and rebuilding.

Long before Greece's War of Independence in 1821, Jews fell roughly into two broad categories: Romaniotes and Sephardim.

The older but smaller Romaniotes were the descendants of Jews who left Palestine after the destruction of the second temple in Jerusalem. Some Romaniotes, most notably in Jannia, claimed that their ancestors arrived in Greece in the wake of the Babylonia conquest of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.E.

The Sephardim settled in Greece after the expulsions of Jews from Spain, Portugal, France and Italy.

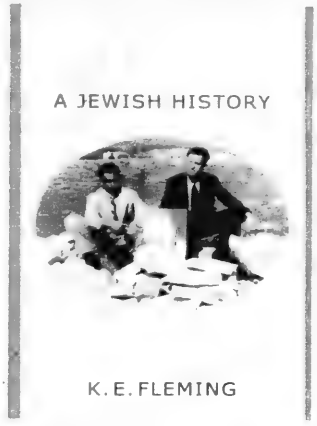
Apart from the Romaniotes and the Sephardim, Fleming notes, there were smaller numbers of Ashkenazim. Like the Romaniotes, they were gradually assimilated into the Sephardic fold.

Before this process took hold in the last century, the Jewish community was riven by tensions pitting Romaniotes against Sephardim.

On Corfu, for example, Romaniotes identified with Greece, while Sephardim looked to Italy. "Well into the 19th century, Corfu's community was so divided that Christian authorities were regularly asked to adjudicate intercommunal disputes," writes Fleming.

As Greece expanded its borders, Jews either sided with Greek forces or remained loyal to the Ottomans.

In Epirus, Jews fought alongside Greek troops, but in other places, most notably Salonika, Jews raised funds to help the Ottomans. "In regions with a pronounced history of anti-Semitism," Fleming says, "the advent of Greek rule was met with trepidation on the part of the Jews, who feared a loss of privileges, security and legal status conferred on them by imperial regimes."



With a strong identity as Ottoman subjects, the Jews of Salonika were the least Hellenized of all Jews in Greece. They suffered the consequences. In 1922, Jewish stevedores in Salonika lost their jobs and were replaced by ethnic Greeks from Asia Minor.

As a result, Jewish port workers immigrated to Palestine. In 1923, when 40 per cent of Salonika's population was Jewish, the local municipality banned Ladino and Hebrew from all public signs.

During the period from the end of World War I to the outbreak of World War II, overt anti-Semitism was not an uncommon phenomenon in Greece, Fleming suggests.

The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, printed in a Greek edition, enjoyed wide circulation. The prime minister of Greece, Eleftherios Venizelos, assured the Jewish community that such views did not reflect the government's position.

For Greek Jewry, the Holocaust was an unmitigated disaster.

Nazi transports from Salonika, in 1943, were the first to leave German-occupied Greece. Crete's entire Jewish community was rounded up in 1944.

When Greek Jews were sent to Auschwitz-Birkenau, the vast majority were immediately gassed. Greek Jews in particular were recruited for the Sonderkommando, the squads that disposed of corpses.

In certain localities, including the island of Zakinthos, Greek Orthodox Christians assisted Jews, hiding them in the mountains with Christian families. Canadian novelist Anne Michaels took note of that incident in her first novel, Fugitive Pieces.

But in Corfu, a senior Greek official collaborated with the Germans, facilitating the deportation and murder of more than three-quarters of the island's 2,000 Jews.

Throughout the rest of Greece, the situation was the same.

Jews in Patras, Volos, Larissa and Trikala were saved by the resistance movement and by municipal authorities. On the other hand, the quisling Greek government, headed by Ioannis Rallis, organized a special police force to hunt down Jews and leftists.

Greece was inhabited by about 70,000 Jews when the German army invaded the country in 1940. When Greece was liberated, 10,000 Jews had survived the onslaught.

"In percentages, this reflects one of the highest destruction rates in all of Europe," observes Fleming.

By her estimate, 50 per cent of Greek Jewish concentration camp survivors emigrated, moving on to Palestine/Israel and, when possible, the United States.

They had reason to leave.

Greece, impoverished by the Nazi occupation, was plunged into civil war in 1946. As well, Jews who tried to reclaim their properties were rebuffed.

Yet Greece, as Fleming states, was the first European country to promulgate laws to help such Jews. These laws, however, were not strictly enforced.

In recent years, the Greek government has commemorated the devastating losses that the Jewish community endured during the Holocaust and acknowledged the contributions of Jews to Greek society. But with only about 5,000 Jews living in Greece today, the past seems more salient than the present.

Junior Maccabiah girls aim for podium performance

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Earlier this season, gymnastics coach Charlene Knudsen decided the girls she trains would forego most local competitions and instead focus their attention on events south of the border.

From Knudsen's perspective, the move would pay off by giving her athletes some valuable international experience and better prepare them for the Maccabiah Games in July.

With the Games fast approaching, Knudsen is confident her girls will show well in Israel.

As co-owner of the Markham Gymnastics Club, as well as coach of the Maccabiah junior (under-15) and open teams, she'll be taking two of her club girls to Israel – Dana Potashner and Lindsay Solmon, both 13. Joining them on the junior team are 13-year-olds Amelia Briggs-Morris, Sabrina Barsky and Amanda Wolfe, all of Toronto.

Last December, Knudsen and the junior girls competed in the Nadia Comaneci International Invitational in Oklahoma City. Potashner finished second all around, Solmon was fourth and Briggs-Morris won the gold medal for best performance overall.

In February, the Markham Club participated in the Vegas Cup and the team finished third.

A month later at the GTC Classics – Motown Madness in Michigan, the team earned another third-place finish.

To further prepare her charges for the Maccabiah Games, which run from July 12 to 23, Knudsen is consulting with a gymnastics judge "to put together the most amount of difficulty to give us an edge." (Athletes who successfully complete a more difficult manoeuvre score higher than those who finish an easier one.)

"At the same time, we want to be clean, to stay on the equipment and stick," she said.

Knudsen, who will be visiting Israel for the first time, said despite the expected tough competition from the United States and former East Bloc countries, "I'm expecting to go there and be on the podium."

In past Maccabiahs, Canada sent one or two athletes who competed individually. Now, for the first time, Canada will field a full team in junior and open events, allowing the girls to compete on an individual level and to have their scores count toward team results.

Solmon, a Grade 8 student at the Academy for Gifted Children – P.A.C.E., said that the Maccabiah "is going to be a really big thing for me – my first time in Israel and my first international competition. It's going to be amazing."

Solmon said she's particularly curious to visit the Dead Sea and other well-known sites she's heard about.

As to the competition, for months she's been training 22 hours a week and she's seen a great improvement in her skills.

Potashner, a Grade 8 student at United Synagogue Day School, is also excited about the Maccabiah experience. "I hope that as a team and as individuals, the Canadian team will do very well. We'll just try our hardest and have fun."

She's looking forward to meeting other Jewish athletes from around the world: "As Jews, you have a special connection and it makes me happy to meet people from around the world with the same beliefs and to share the experience together."

Knudsen said the girls' performance level is consistently good. "Lindsay brings great strength to the floor exercise and the vault, and Dana brings great strength to the bars and the vault."

Like the young athletes, Knudsen is looking forward with relish to the Games. "I'm really excited to go with the Canadian team. This will be my first international podium competition [outside North America], and I'm interested in seeing the other countries and being part of the international experience and represent my country."

Both Solmon's and Potashner's families will be accompanying the girls to Israel, and Knudsen believes that will add to the experience.

"It's very special for the athletes to go to Israel and be part of the whole experience. It's very meaningful for the girls to be in Israel with their families," she said.

Ram, Erlich go separate ways – for now

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

For the first time in their careers, Israeli tennis players Andy Ram and Jonathan Erlich – the once-formidable duo dubbed AndiYoni who won the 2008 Australian Open – played last week at a major tournament with separate partners.

Ram teamed up with Max Mirnyi of Belarus in the first round of the French Open doubles tournament, while Erlich paired with Rohan Bopanna of India.

Ram decided not to pair with Erlich, who recently recovered from an injury, after the Challenger tennis tournament held in Ramat Hasharon. They're expected to resume their successful partnership later in the year.

Meanwhile, Israel's top singles player Dudi Sela competed in the second round of the singles tournament against Marin Cilic of Croatia, the 13th seed in the competition.

Those difficult decisions

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

I was the on-call covering physician. The medical resident was bringing me up to date. I could see from the corner of my eye a middle-aged woman and her two young adult children looking in our direction. She came over and asked if we would have time to speak to her about her mother. After we finished our rounds, we met the family in the quiet room.

"When do you think the swallowing study will take place?" the woman asked. "I know it is the holidays, so I guess it could be a few more days."

I knew from the discussion I'd had with the resident that the issue here was one of recurrent aspiration pneumonia, which means the contents of food and what is normally in back of the mouth enter the lungs and cause pneumonia. Although each pneumonia episode might respond to antibiotics, there are often recurrent bouts of infection because the underlying condition causing the pneumonias is often difficult to treat and each infection is a step in the direction of the final fatal illness that no longer responds to treatment.

The ill person often suffers from a neurological disorder such as strokes or late-stage dementia. It is very unlikely that the swallowing mechanism will improve substantially. In order to confirm that there is a severe swallowing disorder, one does a swallowing study in which X-ray contrast material is swallowed, and if it goes into the lungs rather than the esophagus, the risk of aspiration is confirmed.

If this is found, the usual recommendation is to insert a feeding tube directly into the stomach so that nutrition can be provided without the risk of the food being inhaled and causing aspiration pneumonia again.

I asked the woman's daughter, "Have you ever discussed with your mother or with your father [who we learned was cognitively aware and living at home] whether she would want a permanent feeding tube if she were not able to eat?"

As I expected the answer was, "We would never have discussed such an eventuality."

I said, "Even in the absence of direct discussions, from knowing your mother's values, what do you think she might have said to that prospect?"

"I do not know, but my father seems to be going in the direction of stopping the suffering and letting nature take its course."

I continued, "If you really believe that putting in a feeding tube is not what she would have wanted and your father would perhaps be the best judge of that, then doing a swallowing study may not be necessary. No matter what is found, you will have already decided that a tube is not what she would want."

I could see that this discussion was not one that they had contemplated. "If the decision is that a tube will not be used, then we can decide to do our best to feed her whatever she can tolerate and focus on making her comfortable, rather than pursuing all modern medicine's technological possibilities such as X-rays and feeding tubes," I said.

From the point of view of law and of ethical principles, not putting in a tube and withdrawing a feeding tube are the same, but in general people react differently to the two acts – one seems to be accepted as a rational choice, the other an act tantamount to "killing."

I asked the daughter and her children to have that deeply meaningful conversation with their family and consider their choices before making a final decision.

These are not easy decisions, but if done with thought and care, they can ease the decision-making process.

GROUND VEAL MUSHROOM HERB LOAVES

1 tbsp olive oil
1/4 c chopped walnuts
1 c finely chopped onion
1 c finely chopped mushrooms
2 cloves garlic, minced
1/2 tsp each, salt and fresh cracked pepper
1/4 c each, finely chopped fresh dill and parsley
1 lb lean ground veal
2 tbsp flax seeds
1 egg, lightly beaten

Preheat oven to 350° F. In skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat. Stir in onion and mushrooms; cook, stirring often until onions are soft, golden and no liquid remains, about 8 min. Add garlic, cook 1 min. Remove from heat and transfer to large bowl. Stir in salt, pepper, flax seeds, walnuts, dill and parsley. Let cool completely. Stir in veal and egg, mixing thoroughly until well combined. Transfer to 6 lightly greased muffin tins. Bake 45 min. Let cool slightly before serving.

Eggstremely good for you

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

One of the questions I often get asked by my patients, and one that I believe is rooted in a popular misconception for many people, is: "How many eggs can I eat per week or can I eat eggs at all?"

Eggs are actually a safe and healthy food for all Canadians to consume fairly regularly. Here's what you need to understand. First, the facts: one egg contains 75 calories; 6 grams of protein, which is good; and 5 grams of fat (2 of them saturated). So, eggs are a good source of protein and very filling, making them a good food choice. The 5 grams of fat are not huge considering you can eat 40 to 60 grams of fat per day and maintain weight.

An egg also has 212 mg of dietary cholesterol. What raises the cholesterol in our body is actually fat, particularly trans fat and excess saturated fat. And yes, each egg yolk does have some saturated fat.

Then what's the best way to incorporate eggs into your diet?

I believe you can eat eggs often, but try this: use 1 whole egg plus two to three additional whites. Each egg white contains a mere 16 calories and 0 grams of fat along with 3 grams of protein, so you get the colour and flavour of the whole egg but a controlled amount of fat along with a very low calorie, filling portion of protein.

Eggs get you into trouble when you have a three-egg omelet, which has 15 grams of fat, with a tablespoon of oil or butter in the pan for another 10 grams of fat. If you add cheese, you are now having an omelet with 30 to 40 grams of fat!

So enjoy your eggs often. You can buy egg whites on their own to limit waste if you wish, mix them with your one whole egg, spray your pan with cooking spray and enjoy!

That boy said I'm a ganif

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I was riding my bicycle home from the office recently, and as I passed a home near Lawrence and Bathurst, a small, chassidic boy yelled at me, "Ganif," the Yiddish/Hebrew word for thief.

I stopped my bike, smiled at him and yelled back, "Chas ve'shalom," which basically means "God forbid."

The little boy froze in his tracks, likely startled that a kippah-less man understood Yiddish/Hebrew and had a phrase of his own in his back pocket.

Why would this small fellow call me a ganif? (I don't know what's worse: being called a lousy kike by an anti-Semite, or a ganif by a Jew). I wasn't bothering him or the neighbourhood, and I certainly wasn't stealing anything. Did this adorable tyke think that because I wasn't from the same "background" as him that I must be a thief?

Why, upon telling some friends this story, did I hear about other incidents in which frum children were taught by their elders that anyone who isn't like them in terms of religious adherence should be considered a goy – a gentile or a bad person?

I remember well my yeshiva education, which included the belief that those who don't follow Halachah aren't God's chosen people and are equivalent to idol worshippers. I was frequently told that my father, of blessed memory, a God-fearing Orthodox rabbi, was a shaigetz – a terribly pejorative term referring to a non-Jewish man, but literally meaning a creepy crawling thing, a detestable scoundrel or varmint – because his pulpit was in a shul without a mechitzah, which divides women and men during Orthodox prayer services.

These hateful attitudes and belittling expressions go both ways, however. I have lived in both the religious and non-religious communities and have a fair idea of the lack of brotherhood and sisterhood that can exist in and between both.

I have heard many negative comments from Jews who would describe themselves as Reform, Conservative or secular about haredi Jews, suggesting the latter are an embarrassing blotch on our community and willfully damaging Judaism. These comments are equally as disparaging as the ones emanating from frum Jews.

A similar divide exists in Israel, but groups such as Gesher (www.gesher.co.il) are working to counter it. On its website, Gesher describes the challenge and potential solution this way: "Israel's growing polarization is exacerbated by the negative stereotypes its secular and religious communities hold regarding one another. Secular Israelis often see their fellow religious citizens as fanatics who aim to impose their own values… Religious Israelis often regard their secular peers as libertines whose values are limited to their own self-gratification. To combat these destructive prejudices, there can be no intervention more effective than authentic encounter, dialogue and recognition of the other's common humanity."

The schism between haredi Jews and their non-religious counterparts in Toronto is huge, but unlike Israel, it's not being dealt with at all. It is, therefore, paramount that we create an entity like Gesher to bring together Jews of all backgrounds in a safe environment, giving them a chance to see the things that unify us, and understand and respect the things that separate our communities.

Dealing with this problem is inordinately important for many reasons, not the least of which is ensuring that our home front is united so that we can fight an even greater and more troublesome challenge – namely, anti-Semitism, which continues to lurk in the hallways of places such as York University and elsewhere and doesn't care about the denominational choice of its targets.

Sometimes it seems as if so many of us are sitting around waiting for solutions to happen. They won't. We need to fight.

"A DONATION TO MOUNT SINAI IS AN INVESTMENT IN OUR FUTURE.

We should know. We've made a living out of making investments. So when we committed a major donation to Mount Sinai, we saw it as a long-term investment for both our children and our grandchildren. Not only as a contribution to current medical and healthcare issues, but towards scientific research as well. And we've seen the great medical breakthroughs they've made recently — so we know our donations are working hard. Mount Sinai is simply an enormous resource for our community. Whatever you give is certainly well given."

Kosher catering: a modern tradition

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Tradition: it was important to Tevye and it's still important when you're making a simchah. Now it's easier than ever to honour the traditions of kashrut at any life-cycle event or gathering. From the time-honoured warmth of a synagogue to the spacious halls of the Air Canada Centre, choosing kosher food for any number of guests is both delicious and simple.

Why not hold a Jewish event in the ultimate Jewish venue: a shul? "It's quite wonderful and very touching," says Edmund Duarte of Uptown Gourmet Catering (416-633-3838), in-house caterer to Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, particularly when several generations of celebrations happen within the shul.

Which isn't to say there's nothing new in shul catering. "We try to be innovative, inventive; ahead of the curve as opposed to following it… there are things that people are doing out there that we started seven years ago," Duarte says. From martini-glass soup shooters to mushroom stations, he loves creating fun, customized menus that surprise and delight. "If it's kosher and it's within your budget, we'll do it."

When an occasion calls for a more traditional approach, for 30 up to 500 diners, there's no culinary compromise. "We do a lot of the traditional foods. I think we do them extremely well – there are 72 years of experience in my kitchen," Duarte says.

"People used to say, 'What do you expect? It's kosher.' Now, we have an educated consumer who expects quality, expects service, presentation equal to or superior to any fine restaurant in the city of Toronto. That's what we try to supply."

Duarte, who oversees each simchah personally, acknowledges the hot competition in the venue market and emphasizes that a synagogue must also hold its own as a venue. "Weddings are about elegance – this ballroom is one of the most elegant rooms in the city of Toronto," he says.

"Beth Emeth is not necessarily [just] a synagogue… we are a venue that comes with a built-in rabbi. We are a beautiful venue, with a beautiful room, with beautiful facilities."

Easy parking, security and convenient midtown location also make Beth Emeth an attractive site for family or corporate gatherings. Great food and great service make it an exciting venue, and its commitment to Jewish observance and rich history within Toronto's Jewish community ultimately sets it apart from the crowd.

Sometimes, tradition thrives in the most unusual places, such as the Royal Ontario Museum or Casa Loma. Whether it's an intimate family dinner or a community-wide event for thousands, Zuchter Berk Creative Caterers (416-386-1086; www.zuchterberk.com) offers almost 80 years' experience in creating premium kosher dining with a surprisingly flexible price tag.

Zuchter Berk's Isaac Drookman isn't above bragging a little: "We were the first ones to bring in kosher caviar," he says. Or about the fact that each event is personally supervised by a full-time employee assigned exclusively to that event, "from the very beginning to the very end."

Or about the beef. "We always age our beef in-house," Drookman says. Most kosher restaurants and caterers don't age beef due to the cost of storage space. Yet "it's the difference between good and great – it makes it an upscale meal."

A huge range of venues let clients tailor a simchah's menu and other factors to almost any budget and expectation. Beyond synagogues, which include three of Toronto's largest (Beth Tzedec Congregation, Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and the Sephardic Kehila Centre), Zuchter Berk's website lists dozens of popular sites around Toronto – and beyond.

"We just did a getaway in Montreal – 12 days straight, for 450 people, breakfast, lunch and dinner," Drookman says. Through an exclusive arrangement, Zuchter Berk will also soon begin offering kosher food services at Horseshoe Valley Resort, perfect for life-cycle or community events or golf tournaments.

Zuchter Berk's repertoire includes both meat and dairy catering, which isn't just for breakfast anymore: increasingly trendy daytime weddings often feature a delicious dairy menu. Another special touch: a full range of bakery services, with all baked goods created in-house. "At a Zuchter wedding, you'll see unique pastries that you won't see at others."

Even when it comes to wedding cakes, Zuchter Berk will design or help couples create something truly special: a sumptuous centrepiece for an occasion served up in the finest tradition of service and style.

One-stop shop carries the latest in party favours

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

Want to make your next event a fun and memorable one? Look no further than Incredible Novelties (416-663-9900; www.incrediblenovelties.com) to meet all your party needs.

Former DJs and business partners Saul Sacks and Dan Jankelow have kept busy setting trends in the one-stop party shop industry for almost eight years. They got into the business after noticing clients at the bar and bat mitzvahs they were working at had no idea what to do with the novelty items they purchased, or how many they should be purchasing.

"Incredible Novelties is a one-stop shop where we bring you the latest trends in party favours and prizes for the bar and bat mitzvah industry," Sacks said. "We're the trendsetter in the industry."

At Incredible Novelties, the focus is on not only providing a place to shop for party favours, but also an excellent, one-on-one client service experience. When clients comes into the store, first they are asked about their vision for the party and how many guests are attending. A consultant then takes them around the showroom to help put together an order and also gives advice on how the items they're purchasing should be used, so that there will not be any waste at the end of the night. The prizes are delivered to the event location the day of the party, ready for the DJs to hand out.

At Incredible Novelties, you can find everything you can imagine – and even some things you can't. Boas in a rainbow of colours, wigs, bandanas and a ton of hats, including one that lights up; LED music notes, fans and cola glasses are just some of the myriad of products available. There truly is something for everyone, regardless of budget.

"Our whole concept is budget friendly," Sacks said. "We've adapted to the economy by bringing in a lot of inexpensive items. We understand that there's a recession and people are having a hard time right now, so we adapt to the market to make sure we can service every single person having a party.

"The bottom line is, whatever the budget for any client, no matter what, it makes no difference. We will be there to work with them 100 per cent."

If something more personalized is what you're after, Incredible Novelties also does customized items – practical ones that will get used after the party. Calculators, business-card holders, calendars, USB keys and travel mugs are some of what they have to offer. Custom orders like these can be done in a week if need be, but generally take seven to 10 business days.

"What we're really known for in the industry is turnaround time, fast response. Our number one focus in this business is customer service," Sacks said.

With all their regular sale items kept in store, finding what you need is always possible, even at the last minute. And with items arriving weekly, there is always something new to check out.

Pros raise photography to artform

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

If a picture is worth a thousand words, choosing a photographer is key to preserving the memories of a great simchah.

Horvath Studio in Thornhill specializes in portraits for all occasions, including weddings, engagements, bar/bat mitzvahs and milestone events. Both indoor and outdoor, colour and black and white photos are offered, as are services such as photo framing and retouching.

Horvath has been around for nearly 50 years. Owner Sam Sciarrino, a self-taught master photographer, has been there since 1984.

There's still plenty of competition in the industry, but Sciarrino believes only a select few can compete with Horvath's track record.

"We don't use cheap consumer equipment to do a professional job" he explains. "We use professional equipment. We spend a lot of money on it and we follow through. These are the differences today, because there are a lot of people who are just jumping in the business and put the camera on automatic, using their 'prosumer' equipment and think they're getting away with it, but they're not."

While anyone can point and shoot, it's vital to understand the basic fundamentals of the art form, such as lighting and composition, a reality that's often overlooked.

"[It's] a natural knack that you can't really teach people" Sciarrino says, "and if you can incorporate that with your technical side, then you have a style all your own, which can be very hard to duplicate, because it's something that's within, it's not something from a textbook."

Mark Gilligan has been interested in photography ever since he was a young teen. He started as a professional at Macdonnell Photography in 1998 while still attending Sheridan College. Since he was already fairly advanced in the artform, he used his opportunity at Sheridan to improve his craft and take full advantage of its facilities

Sam Sciarrino

While at Macdonnell, Gilligan got into shooting weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs. What impressed him most about the studio was what it had to offer in terms of available equipment.

"The first time I stepped into their studio and saw what you could do with photography, I was hooked from then on," he says.

Gilligan predominantly uses medium-format Hasselblad cameras, preferring them over most of the other formats favoured by many photographers.

"A lot of photographers try to just use a 35 millimetre SLR" he says, "and I've just felt over the years and through some of my teaching that [having] a slightly bigger camera allows you to see more and feel more as you're setting up the composition in an image."

Gilligan has been eager to make a name for himself in the field since leaving Macdonnell. Recently, he built a galley-style studio on the main floor of his Danforth-area house as a first step toward professional independence, although he admits that he still has a way to go before he becomes a household name.

"The toughest thing is the marketing side of it, getting people to know who I am and what I do," he explains. "A lot of people, especially in the community I used to work in, knew me as Mark from Macdonnell Photography, whereas now it's about trying to get people to know 'Mark Gilligan Photography.'"

Mark Gilligan

The industry has changed quite a bit since Gilligan began his career, most notably in the switch from film to digital. He considers himself fortunate that he had the chance to begin his early training working in the digital medium, seeing as it is now industry standard.

"I was lucky enough to be in a position where every studio I walked into was on that learning curve of digital photography" Gilligan says.

"Nowadays, digital photography is so accessible to everyone, the bar of quality of the photography is lowering. And that kind of helps me in a way, especially for the portraits. When people aren't using these images that are of higher quality as a professional should have, that's an easy selling point for me."

Guests sell jewelry and coins at gold parties

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Elliot Sylman will pay you to come to a party.

Owner of gold parties 4U (1-877-GOLD-910; 1-877-465-3910; goldparties4u@rogers.com), Sylman will attend a party and buy guests' gold jewelry and coins, no matter the condition.

"I buy broken pieces, single earrings or jewelry that's just plain out of style. I will also buy watches and some gems, and I pay guests on the spot."

Sylman, who has been buying gold for almost 15 years, said that he asks hosts to get together about 12 to 16 people who can drop in throughout the evening.

"It's an easy, relaxed atmosphere. Guests mingle in one room over coffee and dessert or wine and cheese, and I take them aside individually to weigh and appraise their pieces."

Along with paying the guests for their gold, he said he pays the host a commission from the amount of cash he pays out. "I buy all gold, from eight karat to 24 karat, as well as platinum."

Although most guests are women, he said he did have one man who brought two bracelets that his wife had bought for him.

"Some people use the money to buy more current jewelry, and others use it to pay bills or send their kids to camp. It's like found money, because most of these pieces had been gathering dust in the bottom of a jewelry box. Guests walk in with these old, almost forgotten pieces, and they walk out with money."

Some parties have also served as charity fundraisers, he said. "The parties are such a hit that 25 per cent of the hosts book another party.

"A highlight of the party for me is the stories I hear. People tell me where the jewelry is from, and who gave it to them. I hear all kinds of things."

Gold parties are the modern version of Tupperware parties. "Instead of spending money, guests walk out with cash."

Sylman suggests contacting him three to five weeks before a prospective date, and he sends hosts e-vites that they can forward to their guests.

Gift registries cover a gamut of items for every occasion

Entertainers at Catskills resorts used to draw laughs every time they related the adage of the bar mitzvah boy who received so many Mont Blanc pens that when he addressed the congregation, instead of announcing, "Today, I am a man, he said, 'Today, I am a fountain pen.'"

Now that gift registries are ubiquitous, recipients should never have to worry about getting duplicates of things they'll never use.

Let's face it: a bride doesn't need to start off with 15 silver trays, unless she and her husband are going into the catering business. Registering with a reputable store or organization can help prevent this frustrating experience.

Online registry a great time saver

However, celebrants need to decide on the type of gifts they'd like to get and where they would like to order them from.

Although store registries have been around for decades, their online counterparts have only made inroads since the 1990s. As well, when gift registries first started, people associated them with weddings, but now they exist for every occasion. Among the appropriate simchahs are baby namings, brit milahs, milestone birthdays, bar and bat mitzvahs, graduations, engagements and other special occasions.

Of course, weddings remain the most popular of all.

The online gift registry is a win-win concept for giver and receiver. But online gift registries are especially helpful for people living out of town or even in another country or continent. Once given the appropriate URL, a list of items with pictures and prices is immediately accessible. Recipients can monitor the list and augment it as their collection fills.

True, people can always send a cheque, give cash or buy gift certificates, but it's exciting to receive presents, and often the giver will choose something the recipient would never have thought of or splurged on if they went out to buy it.

If the store with the gift registry is near the giver, it's nice to pay a visit, look around and benefit from a sales associate's suggestions. Examining the fabric or hue close up is always reassuring.

Conversely, for busy people, buying online is efficient, and there's nothing to lose, because the recipient can always exchange the item if it isn't appropriate.

But before ordering gifts online, surfers should check to see if the store has a written policy that can be printed out and saved. That way, proof is always on hand and it can save embarrassment, if things don't work out the way they should.

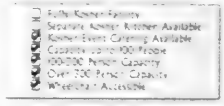
Events and Catering On The Park is located in a stunning historical site in midtown Toronto at 1095 Leslie St., at Eglinton Ave. E.

Formerly Inn On the Park, the venue has been completely renovated and just opened in September 2008. Director Chris Nikoletsos said the venue is perfect for any kind of event, ranging from corporate to bridal, and everything in between.



Events and Catering On The Park's five banquet rooms can accommodate groups ranging from 40 in the Seasons Room to 900 guests in the main ballroom. The Harvest, Oak and Trillium rooms can host 200, 120 and 80 guests respectively.

Although there isn't a kosher kitchen on site, clients are welcome to bring a kosher caterer in for their event.

When planning an event, Events and Catering On The Park offers assistance with every aspect of planning. A team of experienced and professional personnel will assist clients with special occasion requirements. The website, www.eventsonthepark.ca, lists specialties, including security, specialty linens, decorators, event co-ordinators, DJs, bands, musicians, limo service, valet service and florists. "We have the expertise to turn your dreams into reality. Whether you are planning a corporate event or a personal celebration, we are pleased to offer a wide range of services customized to meet the needs of your unique event," Nikoletsos said.

"Our new culinary facilities complement our exquisite in-house catering services. Offering a multitude of modern resources and state-of-the-art amenities, Events and Catering On The Park exudes an air of elegance, class and extraordinary attention to detail."

Music plays a crucial role at simchahs

By MARNI BRENDER BYK
Special to The CJN

Music plays a crucial role at a simchah, whether it accompanies a bridal party down the aisle, is in the background during a cocktail reception, or gets your guests up on their feet for a night of dancing.

Sisters Eleanor Ackerman Rice and Cheryl Ackerman have been playing music together since they were children. As Ivory & Silver (416-918-3602), a keyboard and piano duo, they have been playing together professionally for the last 24 years at wedding ceremonies, receptions and cocktail parties.

With a vast repertoire to draw from, Ivory & Silver can provide your event with everything from classical to soft popular, Israeli music and show tunes. Rice said that the versatility of the keyboard and the sweet sound of the flute provide lovely background music for any function.

With both sisters classically trained, they are very flexible in what they can play and they can perform almost anything by ear. As children, they were both very heavily influenced by their father, musician Dave Ackerman.

"We were raised with music. Dad was a musician, and we grew up listening to show tunes." Dave Ackerman played saxophone, clarinet and flute at the Royal York Hotel Imperial Room and at the King Edward Hotel.

Rice credits her father for teaching them to learn to play a variety of pieces of music, because he knew from experience that one can never anticipate what they will be requested to play. He also taught them that "music is a business and you need to please the customer."

Their father passed away in 1998. Ivory & Silver's CD titled Tribute is dedicated to their parents.

Fern Lindzon (416-225-6977; e-mail: lindzon@rogers.com; website: www.fern-lindzon.com) is up for the challenge to plan the music for your next event. Whether you are looking for a solo pianist or a 10-piece band, Lindzon can book your background music, with or without vocals, and can even co-ordinate live music with a DJ for dinner and dancing at your reception.

Lindzon started playing the piano when she was nine and has been told she started singing at birth. Educated at the Royal Conservatory of Music and the faculty of music at the University of Toronto, Lindzon can provide your simchah with many types of music, including klezmer, Yiddish Israeli, jazz, Broadway, pop and R&B.

Ivory and Silver also have a vast repertoire to choose from.

A performer and music co-ordinator for more than 20 years, Lindzon can provide continuous music throughout the different aspects of your event. Recently at a wedding she went from classical in the ceremony to jazz during cocktails, then during dinner brought in a Cuban band, rock 'n' roll, disco and swing.

Lindzon is confident she can arrange music for a small event or 2,000 people. She works closely with a sound company and thinks about volume, to make sure guests can speak to one another comfortably.

Lindzon said the main things she provides is a personal touch and a large repertoire, as well as the great musicians she works with. She also said that she takes background music seriously .

Lindzon also has a career as a jazz musician and is in the klezmer band Sisters of Sheynville, which has played at klezmer festivals across North America. Lindzon has played at the Toronto Jazz Festival. Her latest CD is called Moments Like These.

Having just celebrated its 10-year anniversary, the Park Hyatt Toronto has been a top venue choice for Jewish couples since its opening.

Located at Avenue Road and Bloor Street, the hotel is surrounded by chic and trendy shops, bars and restaurants.

The Park Hyatt's Roof Salon on the 18th floor provides guests with a panoramic view of Toronto and is perfect for a small dinner to a reception of up to 150 guests. Alexandra Menear, manager of public relations and marketing, said that their rooms are perfect for any occasion.

- ☐ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☑ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☑ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☐ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☐ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

Having an on-site kosher kitchen also lends itself well to hosting a variety of events for the Jewish community. Menear said that the Park Hyatt Toronto is so popular because it is "rare for a hotel to have really good kosher catering." She added that executive chef Joan Monfaredi's food is amazing and that Monfaredi personalizes her menus to the personal tastes of her clients, whether the event is a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah, engagement party, milestone birthday or corporate affair.

With two wedding specialists on staff to work with a bride and groom, there is ample staff to work with clients from the first phone call to the wedding night. In fact, the Park Hyatt Toronto provides a bride and groom with everything they need before, during and after the wedding.

A bride can stay over in one of the hotel's lovely rooms, visit the Stillwater Spa the day of her wedding to get a massage and have her hair and makeup done, then she can dress, walk down the aisle, dance at her reception and retire to her honeymoon suite – all without leaving the comfort of the Park Hyatt Toronto.

For more information about the Park Hyatt Toronto or to book your event, contact Roberta Blanco, director of catering, at roberta.blanco@hyatt.com or 416-324-1572. The hotel's website address is www.parkhyatttoronto.com.

Remember your simchah with a customized sign-in book

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Want that special occasion to last a lifetime? Let HiTIDE Productions capture your most precious moments forever with customized slideshows, photo albums and sign-in books.

Artist Edith Itzcovici-Levy started HiTIDE two years ago out of her house and has since brought life to countless still photos for special occasions, using the latest digital editing software and incorporating a variety of transitional and motion effects, set to music.

Itzcovici-Levy did digital photo slideshows for years as a hobby, usually as a favour for friends. Impressed with her work, they encouraged her to go into business for herself, and she took their advice.

Although many websites now have photo templates that users can run their pictures through to create a slideshow, there are only a limited number of options available for most programs. Itzcovici-Levy, however, doesn't work with a template, and therefore has more freedom with the level of customizations she can offer her clients.

The most recent addition to her repertoire are her customized digital photo sign-in books. These have come a long way since the sign-in boards of the past, when the bar or bat mitzvah child would have a giant board featuring his or her picture and all of the attendees would sign the board. HiTIDE's sign-in books go far beyond that, incorporating a multi-formatted layout of picture montages that reflect the mood of any occasion, whether it's weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs, anniversaries, birthdays or graduations.

"It's not a templated book," she says, "so it's not a one-size-fits-all where I just throw the pictures onto a template. I really design the book the way the client wants it… I sit down with the clients before [the event] when we have our first discussion, and I really try to understand what they'd like. I try to understand what the child's interests are… [and] we'll have that theme running through the slide-show montages or the sign-in book."

Itzcovici-Levy is aware of the competition in her field, especially in an age when many people are technically savvy and own high-end software. Of course, keeping one's product at a fairly reasonable price is also the mark of a reliable professional, an ideology HiTIDE subscribes to.

"I thought, 'There's got to be a middle ground.' I mean, there are people looking to do this stuff who can't afford to spend in the thousand dollar range… so I think what I've done is I've tried to price myself accordingly so that it's affordable to just about everybody, given the time that it takes to put these together."

Itzcovici-Levy is content with the scope of her current projects for now, but says she would like to do more with the medium by utilizing film in her projects. Her goal is to eventually expand into doing more school videos –she is currently working on a slideshow video for a Grade 8 graduating class in Montreal.

Hard Rock Café is a "cool" venue for bar/bat mitzvahs

By MARNI BINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

When planning a simchah, especially a bar or bat mitzvah, most families look for a theme to tie all the elements together. Whether it's baseball, dance, Hollywood, or a winter wonderland, a theme can run from the invitation to the place cards, centrepieces, signing board and loot bags.

Hard Rock Café sales and marketing manager, Marcelo DeOliveira, said the Hard Rock (416-362-3636, www.hardrock.com) at Yonge Street and Dundas Square in the heart of downtown Toronto, is "a venue with a theme already built into it."

For the last 31 years, the Hard Rock Café has been displaying rock 'n' roll memorabilia for its patrons to admire, and, in the last four years or so, it has been catering to boys and girls looking for rock 'n' roll-themed bar or bat mitzvahs.

- ☐ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☐ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

Kids who are involved with music or play music can appreciate the history of the priceless items displayed throughout the Hard Rock Café.

Prominently displayed are some of Bob Dylan's clothes, his guitar and Madonna's corset. The collection includes memorabilia from the 1960s to today's pop and top 40 megastars.

Haley Frydrych, 16, has attended a couple of bar mitzvahs at the venue and was thrilled to come so close to clothing once worn by Britney Spears.

"It was so cool to go somewhere different and get so close to stuff once used by celebrities," she said. She also enjoyed walking the red-carpet entrance, which she said felt just as if she was attending an awards show.

DeOliveira believes the Hard Rock Café is a popular choice for simchahs because people "like the overall feeling of being in a nightclub lounge instead of a banquet hall" and guests enjoy the atmosphere.

The menu for any event can be personalized to reflect the tastes of the hosts. Child favourites are soft pretzels, mini pizzas, mac and cheese, chicken tenders, mini burgers with sweet potato fries, and candy and a create-your-own-sundae station to finish off the meal.

Upscale menu options are available as well, and DeOliveira has a culinary team experienced in many areas that can offer a complete banquet menu to choose from. Some adult favourites are beef teriyaki, seaweed salad, dim sum and vegetarian California rolls, poached wild Alaskan sockeye salmon, grilled beef tenderloin, and white and dark chocolate mousse and a milk chocolate fountain with fresh fruits for dessert. "Depending on the number of guests, we are able to offer our clients the option of having one buffet for the children and a separate buffet or plated service for the adults," DeOliveira said.

As for meeting kosher dietary requirements, DeOliveira offers clients the option to hire a catering company to serve kosher meals during their event.

DeOliveira said that the Hard Rock Café is a full-service venue and staff can assist anyone in planning events.

The Hard Rock Café staff starts the planning process from the day you book, and DeOliveira is there until the last guest leaves.

"We are in contact with our clients from the very first phone call/e-mail until after the event to ensure they have all the support they need from us, from menu suggestions to a DJ, photographer, florist referrals, to day-of support and event coordination. We always ask our clients to be a guest at their own event and let us look after all the details," he said.

The Hard Rock Café is versatile enough to fit a small intimate gathering of 15 people to a 350-person standing reception. The two separate levels can be used for any type of event, and the Hard Rock Café and the Hard Rock Lounge combined offer the maximum space for a large event.

Whether guests are standing or seated, buffet or plated, the Hard Rock Café offers anything you could need for your event – and you can enjoy it sitting next to Van Halen, Willie Nelson or Nickelback's guitars.

Kids who like music (and who doesn't?) can appreciate the history of the priceless items on display. [Photography by Lora]

Your choice of DJ can make or break an event

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

As most youngsters know, a good DJ is the backbone of any party, so it's vital to have someone you trust to bring you the best the industry has to offer.

Samuel Cole-Elkind started his DJ company, Serious Entertainment, with his friend and business partner, Zale Turner. It's a young brand that's centred around bringing both established and up-and-coming performers to Toronto audiences, such as rap artist Aubrey "Drake" Graham, who recently performed a sold-out show at Sound Academy – Serious Entertainment's first concert event – to rave reviews.

"This historic event for Canada put fans in awe of the abundance of public support Serious Entertainment was able to generate and proves that with enough hard work and creativity, you can do anything you set your mind to," Cole-Elkind says of the concert.

"We bring in the best entertainers to Toronto, the best performances," he says. "We choose very carefully whom we are bringing in. We're trying to turn Toronto into what New York is – a world-class entertainment capital."

Cole-Elkind believes in keeping strong ties with the Forest Hill Jewish community he grew up in. These connections have helped him grow Serious Entertainment's talent roster, which includes Drake, whom he describes as "a good Jewish boy from Forest Hill" who attended the same elementary and high school as Cole-Elkind.

Noah Cape re-launched Superfly recently.

Another entertainment brand is Superfly, established by Noah Cappe in 2001, but was re-launched a few months ago as a brand specializing in DJs for corporate events, weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs.

"It just got to the point where I was ready to put the focus back on the private event aspect of my life and had an amazing group of people that were just clamouring for something new and wanting to be a part of a fresh kind of approach," Cappe says.

Cappe is also a Toronto native. As a child, he acted and performed in television and theatre, which led him to where he is today.

"The more I did it," he says of his career, "and the more years of building relationships with suppliers and getting to know a lot of the families and clients, I think I just realized there was a great opportunity for me to be able to take how I thought events could be and what direction I thought these shows could go in and before I knew it, I was sitting behind a desk, steering the ship."

Superfly accommodates all of its clients' needs and is flexible in terms of budget constraints, tailoring an event to fit anyone's particular vision. Essentially, it starts with a DJ as the foundation and then builds from there.

"I don't believe in pre-made packages," Cappe says. "I think that every event is different and that two people can have a party in the exact same venue, with the exact same amount of people and same menu, but want two different experiences. We start all of our contracts and all of our relationships with our clients on the ground floor."

Cappe stresses how much the company has evolved in the past few months since its re-launching, essentially turning into a brand new product. Of note is the addition of an interactive video dance party option for bar and bat mitzvahs, with which Superfly can customize popular music videos and add track mixes and visual effects that surpass the industry standard.

Serious Entertaiment

"We've invested a ton of money in buying top-of-the-line equipment that nobody else in the industry has right now," he says. "I think it really adds something that no one's really seen on the private side before, especially at bar and bat mitzvahs."

"THEMES" in Event Planning :
Downsizing, Restructuring, and Scaling back
Event Planners – A Necessity not a Luxury

Downsizing, restructuring, and scaling back are the recurring "themes" in event planning during this volatile period. Yet, we still want to celebrate life cycle occasions and discover the silver lining in every cloud.

"In discussions with our clients we know everyone is conscious about not going over the top in planning social and corporate events. They don't want to appear too flashy, yet they still want to host events which are elegant, creative and have elements of fun", comments Karen Jacobs of UP & COMING EVENTS.

"As event planners we are able to share ideas and resources to create unique events that have all the elements of a good party, without blowing the budget" adds partner Karen Garscadden.

People often think that having an Event Planner is extravagant and indulgent. "I can do it myself", many say. However, doing it your self can create expensive mistakes and without access to the resources of an experienced planner, one may not always negotiate the best deal.

Garscadden claims "as repeat customers to our vendors, when we need to be budget conscious our suppliers are often approachable and respect restraints. We know how to save you money and get the best bang for your buck."

Whether it's a champagne & caviar extravaganza or a beer and pretzel party, event planners have creative ideas, resources and tricks of the trade to make your party memorable.

In a recent consultation with a bride & groom who were planning their wedding, their professional planner guided them through a series of scenarios that reduced costs over 20%, without sacrificing the overall look and feel of their special day.

It is times such as these, that we need to celebrate more than ever, to lift our spirits and escape (if even for a few hours). So let the party begin!

Up & Coming Events have been planning social and corporate events for over 22 years. Call this award winning team to help you plan your "UP & COMING EVENTS"

Rose Reisman caters tasty, healthy cuisine

By LAURA STRICKER
Special to The CJN

If you're having a corporate party, planning your first dinner party of the summer or organizing a large simchah, Rose Reisman can provide tasty, healthy cuisine for the event.

Rose Reisman Catering (416-467-7758; www.rosereismancatering.com) is going into its fifth year of business. Reisman, who has more than 15 years experience in the healthy eating business, stressed that a nutritious meal is not a tasteless one.

"I want people to know this is the way you live, this is the way you eat, and it's delicious," she said.

Whether the client is a downtown Toronto law firm or someone having a wedding with 500 guests or an intimate dinner party, Rose Reisman Catering will work with event organizers to create the perfect menu – and let clients sample the food ahead of time. Rose Reisman Catering is also happy to create meals for those with specific nutritional requirements.

☐ Kosher
☑ Non-Kosher

"We want to really make sure our clients are happy, and we put all that into our service, which is very important," Reisman said.

To keep clients happy and stress free, Rose Reisman Catering also does event planning. Suggesting the appropriate venue, creating flower arrangements and centrepieces and giving beverage suggestions that complement the menu are just a few of the services they offer.

"You cannot have just one business today in the food industry," she said.

Not only does Rose Reisman Catering serve delicious food, it's also reasonably priced – and won't break the bank. For corporate clients, lunch – consisting of a sandwich and two salads – can be had for about $11.50 a person. Full buffets with main courses, salad and desserts can be prepared for $14.95 each.

With the recent implementation of the Personal Gourmet line, you can get Reisman's tantalizing meals delivered fresh straight to your door. And with her restaurant, Glow, opening in the new Shops at Don Mills, at Don Mills Road and Lawrence Avenue East, in just a few weeks, enjoying Reisman's nutritious meals can become a daily experience.

Party sandwiches, salads, desserts and handmade chocolate

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

You don't need to slave in the kitchen to wow your guests. Catering can be the perfect solution for brunches, teas and showers, and the classic party sandwich is always a hit with guests.

Lesley's Party Sandwiches (www.lesleyspartysandwiches.com) specializes in this party fare.

Owner Lesley Byrne (905-660-0551) has a reputation as the Greater Toronto Area's party-sandwich queen.

She supplies such retail food shops as Pusateri's and What A Bagel. People can also order directly from her at her shop at 55 Glen Cameron Rd., Unit 19, but it's advisable to call ahead, she says.

Lesley's makes all the traditional fillings – salmon, tuna, egg and smoked salmon and cream cheese. She offers ribbon sandwiches – they come in double and triple deckers – as well as triangles and pinwheels. The colourful array is enhanced by her use of whole wheat for nutrition and white bread for added colour.

The traditional fillings are ideal for brit milahs, baby namings, shivah platters, corporate meetings and lunches, and anniversaries and birthday parties.

"I do a lot of kid's party sandwiches like cream cheese and cukes. I'm known for my peanut butter and jam, peanut butter and banana and peanut butter and Nutella sandwiches."

The mother of three and grandmother of seven started the business in her kitchen 20 years ago, shortly after arriving from South Africa. "As an immigrant you're always looking for something new. People enjoyed the sandwiches when I started and it snowballed."

Chocolate Charm specializes in kosher chocolate treats.

For the last four years, her daughter, Nicky Yubal, has been helping Byrne run the business that has grown to a staff of 10.

Lesley's Party Sandwiches

☑ Non-Kosher

Lesley's has also expanded its party sandwich repertoire to include more adventurous fillings, such as Brie cheese and fig preserves, and cheddar and pressed tomatoes.

The company has also diversified the menu to include cocktail wraps, dairy platters with cream cheese and smoked salmon, cheese trays, grilled vegetable platters and scones for high tea.

Byrne says Lesley's now offers "fabulous" salad selections that include, mango salad, a layered Mexican salad, and a mixed greens with strawberries, and cranberries. "This is a delicious salad with homemade sugared almonds and homemade strawberry dressing.

"We also do beautiful vegetable and fruit arrangements," she adds.

She recommends finishing her meals off with a dessert platter.You can choose from a selection that includes an assortment of squares or strawberries and raspberries dipped in chocolate.

If chocolate is your passion, you may want to indulge your guests with the ultimate meal finale – handmade chocolate from Chocolate Charm (416-787-4256). The chocolate shop – it specializes in dairy and parve chocolate treats – is located at 3541 Bathurst St., a few blocks south of Wilson Avenue.

Under COR supervision, Chocolate Charm (www.chocolatecharm.ca) offers truffles, chocolate, baskets trays, smash cakes and a huge array of novelty-shaped gifts, all made from Swiss and Belgian chocolate, says owner Bob Levine."We're a good chocolate shop that happens to be kosher, so we attract people from across the city."

Travel agencies offer trips to Israel for bar/bat mitzvahs

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Planning a bar or bat mitzvah can cause many months of sleepless nights.

You have to worry about choosing the venue, the invitations, the photographer, the menu. and, of course, the entertainment.

Then there's those extra 20 pounds you have to shed before the big night. And we haven't even broached the whole matter of seating arrangements, and who's not talking to who.

Well there's a simple solution for this simchah-induced stress: you can have your child's bar or bat mitzvah in Israel and let the tour companies take care of all the details.

Travel Force Logistics or TFL (905-764-9200 or info@tflcanada.com) and Aufgang Travel (905-771-7800) are two well-established travel agencies specializing in family bar/bat mitzvah tours in Israel.

Both companies offer trips to Masada and the Dead Sea.

Both companies stress the high quality of their tours. "We get the top rooms in the best hotels," says Avi Rodak, vice-president at Aufgang Travel (7077 Bathurst St.; www.aufgangtravel.com).

Ornan Sharaby, owner of TFL, describes the quality of the tours offered through her company as five-star only. The company also offers the Dine Around Program, which is exclusive to TFL, he says. "We give people a list of 10 different upscale restaurants for certain nights in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, where they eat their dinner."

He says the tour leaders "know how keep children occupied so that their parents can relax."

Rodak describes the Aufgang guides as very skilled. "We have our own selection of guides who we feel are the best."

Both TFL and Aufgang offer deluxe group or private family tours. The TFL group tours, which are generally geared to 40 people, are 12 or 15 days. The longer trips include three days in Eilat. The trips are run in March, April, June, July August and December.

Aufgang Travel's bnei mitzvah tours – they keep their groups to 30 to 32 people – are 11 days long and take place from Aug. 16 to 27 and from Dec. 20 to 31.

Both Rodak and Sharaby say that the tours can be customized before and after the group portion to include visits to other areas in Israel or to stops in Europe.

"We don't want anybody's trip to be a cookie-cutter trip", says Rodak.

TFL and Aufgang offer customized as well as group tours, and there are advantages to both, Rodak says "With the customized tours, families have the full flexibility, except where there are specific appointments to be at places. Some visits require advance booking.

"With a group tour, there's not a lot of flexibility in the group context, but what you lose in flexibility, you gain on the social side. You meet new people. The kids meets other kids."

Sharaby says the tour activities are planned to foster friendships between the participants "On our tours they make friends for life," he says.

While there are many similarities between the tours, the bar/bat mitzvah services take place in different venues. TFL holds the service on top of Masada, while Aufgang has traditionally opted for Jerusalem.

Sharaby says that they usually have the bnei mitzvah ceremony on the fourth day. "We can have anywhere between eight and 14 children. We have our rabbis do a rehearsal the day before.

"The children are sent a CD about two months before the trip so that they can prepare for their parshah.".

The service in Jerusalem is customized for the group, says Rodak, explaining that because many of their families are Conservative or Reform, the service is held at the South Wall, where there is no mechitzah. "This way families can be together. Mothers can see their sons' bar mitzvah service, and the fathers can watch their daughters."

He also notes that the South Wall is much quieter than the Kotel or Western Wall.

After the ceremony, TFL celebrates the bnei mitzvah with a big banquet at a hotel in Jerusalem complete with dancing and DJs, says Sharaby, adding that people can also invite relatives in Israel to the party as well as to the ceremony.

Rodak says that the bnei mitzvah ceremony takes place early in the trip so that the children can relax. The banquet may be at a hotel or restaurant, depending on the group.

Both companies offer itineraries that start in Jerusalem and include visits to Masada and the Dead Sea, which is only an hour or so away from the capital. Rodak stresses that they try to minimize the number of hotels people stay at.

After Jerusalem, both travel groups head north to the Galilee and Golan Heights. They do water rafting and tour in jeeps. Aufgang includes zip lining, at Kiryat Shmonah. "You sit in a harness that is clipped to wire that runs down the hillside, explains Rodak.

Travel accommodations for the Aufgang group in the north is at a special kibbutz guest house at Kfar Blum.

Sharaby says his tour group has hotel accommodations at the Sheraton in Tiberius, but the families experience "kibbutz hospitality" when they dine in the private homes of kibbutz families at Ein Gev. His group is also hosted for lunch in Ussifiya, a Druze village.

Both groups then head south along the Mediterranean coast, stopping at such famous landmarks as the Baha'i temple in Haifa, the ancient port of Acco and, of course, Tel Aviv and Jaffa.

Rodak says it is important to choose activities and tour sites that will engage children. For example, he says in Jerusalem, the families participate in neighbourhood games, which is the equivalent of a treasure hunt. "It's a lot of fun for everyone."

The tours include visits to such museums as Yad Vashem in Jerusalem and the Ayalon Institute near Tel Aviv, a secret military factory that produced bullets during the 1948 War of Independence. "The factory was under the laundry. The kids live it and experience it viscerally," says Rodak.

On day 12 of the 15-day tour, the TFL group flies from Tel Aviv to Eilat, where they enjoy a yacht cruise and snorkelling, as well as free time on the beach. The group also visits Coral World Underwater Observatory and Aquarium. "In the glass underwater observatory, you see every type of sea life," says Sharaby.

Swimming with the dolphins at Dolphin Reef is also on the agenda with the bar and bat mitzvahs swimming for free, he says. "It's our gift to the bnei mitzvah."

"The dolphins are very friendly. The children love the idea that they can swim with dolphins."

TFL also offers a free trip to the bnei mitzvah with three paying adults.

"Israel has so many interesting sites that the challenge is to put together a tour in an interesting way so that it's meaningful to the group, says Rodak.

"The family trip to Israel is a great step in the life of the family. There are not that many opportunities to do an adventure like this as a family."

Crafting keepsake ketubot

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

You've chosen the hall, the caterer, the music... now how about a ketubah? Once, the rabbi might have simply provided a standardized marriage document. But today's couples are seeking ketubot that reflect their values as well as artistic taste.

"I've always been really drawn to nature," Moira Sherman said. When it came time to choose a ketubah for her wedding earlier this year, she turned to Michelle Cohen of Ketubah Garden (416-653-9972; website: www.theketubahgarden.com/). Sherman began by visiting Cohen's website and choosing an image that appealed to her love of trees and natural imagery.

Cohen said, "The people who find me say, 'This really spoke to me.'"

For Sherman, the experience went far beyond just choosing a template and filling in the blanks; the ketubah's basic design was just the beginning. Sherman and her fiancé worked with Cohen, who has a degree in religious studies and teaches art at Toronto's Heschel School, on creating a suitable text for the ketubah.

While the traditional Aramaic text has remained more or less standard since the time of the Talmud, liberal rabbis, secular officiants and even the couple themselves are putting more thought into the words they hope will carry their marriage into eternity.

The traditional ketubah text is essentially a contract in which the groom promises to provide his wife with all her needs. Within the Reform and Conservative movements, a ketubah's text might reflect commitments made by both husband and wife; a secular text might affirm cultural over religious ties. An Aramaic or Hebrew version or translation may or may not be included.

Even in more traditional circles, a new form of the traditional text is occasionally used that makes provision for a Jewish divorce, in the event that the marriage doesn't last.

Couples will need to consult with their officiant about the text and possibly the artistic design of the ketubah, Cohen said. Many have strict rules about what must be included, and they can also help spot-check for errors. "You don't want to know on the day of the wedding that there's a mistake."

Beyond the text, Sherman wanted a ketubah that she could display proudly in the home she and her husband share, and didn't hesitate to work with Cohen to get what she wanted. "I told her, 'Here are the colours in our bedroom,'" Sherman said. Based on that, Cohen recommended colour choices for the text, along with gold illumination to highlight the image.

With the text and colours finalized, Cohen sent an e-mail proof to Sherman, who loved what she saw. But even then, she was unprepared for how much she'd love the finished ketubah when she saw it in person: "It was just stunning – it was absolutely beautiful. It almost had a Celtic, whimsical feel to it," Sherman said.

Though much of Cohen's business is now international, thanks to her website (which is being revamped to make it even easier to buy online), her favourite part of the ketubah business may still be the moment when local clients come over to see what they've created together. "One couple saw it, [and said], 'It's really happening – we're really getting married,'" she said.

Beyond the standard templates on her website, Cohen can customize ketubot to incorporate meaningful graphics and even photographs: a picture of the couple or a symbol they want to weave into the image.

Weddings aren't the only thing keeping her busy. Anniversary ketubot are a particularly thoughtful gift, often from a couple's children, for a couple who may have been married for 40 or 50 years with only a standard synagogue-issue ketubah.

An anniversary ketubah can include meaningful artistic touches and text that acknowledges the couple's long-lasting commitment and the family they have created together, even sometimes incorporating the names of their children and grandchildren in flowing, natural designs.

The giclée print process Cohen uses is a modern innovation over the traditional lithography method. While lithography requires large print runs to make it affordable, giclée gives Cohen the flexibility to create an individual high-quality ketubah print using fade-resistant, archival-grade inks and papers.

"It's truly a piece of art," Sherman said. And despite the fact that most of her interactions with Cohen were online, it was never just about filling in a form. "There was a lot of care put into the process," Sherman added.

With hundreds of ketubah artists worldwide, there's no shortage of websites to turn to. But as Sherman discovered, what counts is not so much the number of predefined choices but rather the ability to make the experience personal.

Working with an artist to craft a custom ketubah that will reflect the couple's unique spiritual values and esthetic can become one of the more meaningful preparations for a lasting marriage.

Klezmer music has a lot of popular appeal

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Musicians Jonno Lightstone, band leader of Hu Tsa Tsa and member of the Yiddish Swingtet (416-651-7521), and Jordan Klapman of the Yiddish Swingtet (416-588-0854), are quick to dispel any ideas that klezmer music has only limited appeal.

"[Klezmer] is very popular worldwide," Lightstone says. "You can hear klezmer music all over Europe now. There's klezmer bands in Germany, Italy, France, Poland and parts of the U.S."

For the uninitiated, klezmer is an eastern European style of Jewish music that originated in the 19th century and has its roots in European folk and polka music, but later mixed in elements of jazz, swing, big band and classical after making its way across the ocean to the new world. Staple instruments include fiddles, keyboards, accordion, strings, brass and percussion, but a variety of others may also be incorporated.

Klezmer has a loyal following among Jews, but it's also become a subcultural phenomenon in the wider musical world.

"It's pretty broad, the demographic that likes klezmer music," Lightstone says. "For swing music, it's usually a little older, but klezmer appeals to a broad range of people, young and old... a lot of non-Jews like the upbeat feel of klezmer music. It's so joyous, and I think that's contagious. Everybody likes good, fun party music."

Jordan Klapman

Lightstone got into klezmer through a friend who had a klezmer band in California. When he heard them play, he felt the passion of the music, and knew it was something he had to get into.

When asked about his influences, Lightstone mentions the steady diet of classic rock he grew up with, including the likes of the Beatles and Rolling Stones, but he also had an appreciation for the old, pre-World War II recordings made in New York by Jewish artists such as Dave Tarras and Naftuli Bronvine, as well as more modern recordings by Brave Old World.

Lightstone's bandmate, Klapman, expresses a similar passion for the genre, stemming from his Jewish roots.

"I kind of fell in love with this stuff," he says. "It's great – very beautiful, very exciting and also very meditative Jewish music... that was kind of my introduction to really knowing what Jewish music was beyond Havah Nagilah and the Israeli experience, which is what [my generation] all grew up with."

Initially, like many klezmer musicians, Klapman played gigs at weddings and bar mitzvahs, but recently he's moved on to playing jazz festivals as an accompanist and as a music director for various vocalists, such as Adi Braun. On the side, he also works as a lecturer on the music of Tin Pan Alley, the great Broadway composers and Jewish pop musicians such as Carole King, Neil Sedaka and Burt Bacharach.

As with Lightstone, Klapman has his own list of favourite musicians he grew up listening to: Fats Waller, Duke Ellington, Teddy Wilson and Oscar Peterson, to name a few.

Lightstone and Klapman note that klezmer has both influenced, and been influenced by other musical genres as it has evolved over time.

"I've always maintained that klezmer is the original world music, because it was developed by Jewish musicians wherever they lived, and it's the result of them coming into contact with many different cultures and integrating that into Jewish music," Klapman says.

Jonno Lightstone

He continues: "The Yiddish Swingtet has been a group that's grown out of [Lightstone's] klezmer experience and mine. It's sort of a hybrid that allows us to do authentic klezmer music, as well as classic swing jazz. And we kind of wear two hats with that group – both a Jewish hat and a Benny Goodman, Django Reinhardt, Gypsy-swing kind of thing as well."

And it's precisely that kind of universality that Klapman believes has both Jews and gentiles making repeat visits to their concerts.

"It appeals to everybody," he says. "We've done folk festivals, we've done jazz festivals, [and] we've even played baptisms [and] taken it into churches... I love the way this music bridges communities."

The Yiddish Swingtet's latest CD, Shul Days, was released in 2007 and has been getting considerable airplay on CBC and Sirius radio.

Pistachio's eco-friendly invitations, gifts send twofold message of caring

Think green. Think small carbon footprint. Think renewable resources and recycled materials. Think vegetable-based inks. Think sexy.

Sexy?

Any notion that earth-friendliness equates to homeliness is quickly dispelled at Pistachio, where eco and cachet go hand in hand.

In seven short months, Pistachio has evolved, in the psyche of the buying public, from an intriguing but somewhat unknown quantity to a nonpareil destination for customized invitations and unique gifts. With two locations and expansion on the horizon – and product availability in selected Indigo and Chapters stores – the brand's acceptance and share of mind have enjoyed exponential growth.

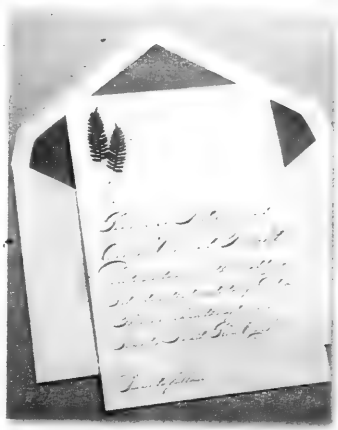
Custom stationary

In the not-too-distant future, when earth-friendly stationary and gifts have gone mainstream and giving natural comes naturally, some will look back and credit Heather Reisman's brainchild with having provided the initial impetus. Others will simply continue to derive as much pleasure from giving as getting; buying eco has that effect on you.

Before you get up close and personal with the merchandise, however, the very materials from which the store is constructed are a testament to eco-sensitivity. From the recycled wood floor to the cornstarch-based packaging, Pistachio is earth-friendly from the ground up; instore signage explains how the materials used in its construction were sourced. If a better world awaits us tomorrow, this is surely a portal into it.

Enviro-goodness, however meritorious, does not a brisk business make sans style and panache. Happily, Pistachio's product selection has both in spades, suggesting a new-age adage: if it's ecochic, it'll sell quick.

Of particular interest if you're planning a simcha is the opportunity to print personalized invitations by letterpress, the oldest traditional printing technique. The hand of the pressman ensures that each impression is unique. Eschewing gaudy intricacy in favour of exquisite simplicity – generally featuring one or two precise design elements and, often, two-toned or two-textured envelopes – the finished product has won over a growing number of wedding and Bar Mitzvah planners.



Where style meets earth-friendliness

"A stunning invitation makes a statement," says President Kirsten Chapman. "Printing on recycled materials makes a statement within a statement." Underscoring the environmental commitment is the content (100% post-consumer recycled) and the certification (100% FSC (Forest Stewardship Council)).

A Suite of coordinated Invitations, RSVPs, Menus and Thank-You notes not only echoes this twofold mantra of ethics and aesthetics, it's priced competitively with both mainstream offerings and other letterpressed products. And it may be the only such stationary printed right here in Toronto.

Digitally-printed invitations are also available, with 24-48 hour turnaround time.

The price range is wide, but affordability rules the day. From kids' party bags for as little as $10 to a range of other items under $15, it's clear that earth-friendly can also be pocketbook-friendly.

In addition to an Apothecary brimming with the very best in Skin Care, Bath & Body Care, Personal Care, Hair Care and Fragrance products (from Jurlique, Pharmacopia and John Masters Organics, among others), Pistachio has sections for baby (including organic blankets), toddlers, toys and crafts, specialty foods and beverages, kitchen, garden, pets, and an extensive paper department featuring greeting cards, boxed notes, stationary sets and gift wrap.

Baby and toddler safety

When you're shopping for babies through toddlers — yours or someone else's — Pistachio provides the added comfort zone of safety. In today's marketplace there's considerable uncertainty surrounding the content of lead and other deleterious elements in children's toys. Not so at Pistachio, where you can check labels and ask probing questions because you want to, not because you have to. Each item sold here is carefully scrutinized to ensure it's safe for people of all ages. So when Junior initiates his new toy by sticking it in his mouth, relax. Earth-friendly, non-toxic paint makes it safer to gnaw on than some fast foods.

A member of the Pistachio team from the get-go, Chapman has enjoyed "the learning curve involved in researching the full spectrum of products — where they're from, how they're made, with what" — and sharing that knowledge with customers. It's been especially gratifying, she adds, to be part of a groundswell that's seen more and more customers embrace the Pistachio experience and become more environmentally aware in the process.

Who knew invitation prepping and shopping down-to-earth could be so uplifting?

Party planners make sure simchahs run smoothly

By MARNI BRINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

Sometimes the only person who can make sure your event runs smoothly is a party planner, wedding planner or consultant.

She knows who should be where, when they should be there, and how to make sure to make things right when something goes wrong. She can find that vegetarian meal for your cousin who never rsvped, she can find the right florist, and she works behind the scenes the day of your event so you don't have to.

Judy Stein of Judy Stein Consulting (905-764-2728, www.judysteinconsulting.com) was 19 years old when she was hired to plan her first party. She was offered the job because of her personality and because she looked organized, not because she had any experience, she said. "York University didn't have a course at the time for party planning," she joked.

Shortly after her first party-planning experience, she was a bridesmaid five times in a two-month period and found herself lending a helping hand at every wedding.

Judy Stein has planned all kind of parties from birthdays to corporate events , weddings and bar mitzvahs.

At her friends' weddings, Stein noticed that there was a need for someone to listen to brides, instead of telling the brides what to do, which is still her philosophy 31 years later.

Stein has planned parties of all kinds: birthdays, anniversaries, weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, and corporate events. She encourages brides to call her once they have a ring and a date in mind, and then let her do the legwork for you. Stein keeps her clients on track, so they don't do things too early or too late.

Stein has already received bookings for 2012 and 2013, and she said business has not slowed down since the economic downturn. She finds people are scaling back their budgets but not their wants and needs for their simchahs. She said that when budgets shrink, her clients turn to her to make sure the event doesn't look scaled back at all.

Stein believes that her clients are happy at the end of the day because their event is a reflection of what they are about, not what she is about. She said she makes their dreams happen.

Sharlene Wilder, owner of A Wilder Party (416-712-9790, www.awilderparty.com), considers herself to be an "event concierge" and said she offers "a new approach to event planning and consulting."

Wilder said that people think they have everything covered in their event-planning process and then sometimes they face a stumbling block along the way. She said this is where her services factor in.

Wilder is available as both a consultant and event planner, and/or can be hired by the hour for specific services. She compared her services to those offered by a concierge – the client has a desire and she fills it, whether it is shopping for loot bags, helping to make centrepieces, or using her contacts to fulfil event needs. She takes on tasks that are too difficult or time consuming for clients to do on their own.

Wilder started event planning at a young age, because her mother was a party planner and she helped out. Wilder sees herself as someone who is there along the journey, not just at the destination.

Wilder prides herself on thinking outside the box and providing different ideas about options for simchah baskets, décor and giveaways.

Her primary focus has been on bar and bat mitzvahs, because she can use her creativity and she knows kids. However, she is available for any event or need. There is no task too big and no detail too small for her.

Everything you can possibly need – kippot, tzizit, tallitot and lots more.

One-stop shop for all your Judaica

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Looking for the best deals in town for all your Jewish shopping needs? Make The Israeli Source your one-stop shop for wholesale Judaica.

The Israeli Source has been around since 2006. Located at 60 Doncaster Ave., in Thornhill, Ont., it's considered by many to be the go-to store for all things Jewish.

Israeli Source owner Chuck Elnekave had his beginnings in the business working with his family importing wholesale products from Israel. Elnekave met his wife, Barbara, while working at another local Judaica store, and together they started their own brand to "give the Toronto community a different approach to Judaica shopping."

A hands-on experience

Israeli Source has everything one could want when looking for Jewish products – from kippot, tzitzit, tallitot and tfillin to holiday and gift items like books, dreidels, mezuzot, candles, Kiddush cups, artwork and jewelry. There's also a wide variety of audio-visual material such as CDs and DVDs for kids and adults, as well as computer software and accessories.

Although there may not be a lot of competition for this kind of Jewish specialty store in Toronto, there is a certain limitation to having a business that's concentrated on one particular demographic.

"It's a very seasonal business we're running here," Elnekave says, "There's Pesach, there's Rosh Hashanah, there's Chanukah… During the rush with all the weddings, it's helpful [for business], but there are definitely seasonal ups and downs."

Elnekave will be expanding his store's current online selection to include a separate website called simchacentre.com, which will focus on catering to customers' wedding and bar/bat mitzvah needs. Although many stores seem to thrive on being online for the sake of convenience, Elnekave says Israeli Source remains primarily a hands-on experience for shoppers.

"I find that people still do want to be able to come in to our store and actually touch and feel," he says. "It's not like buying a DVD, where you just want to get the title you want and that's it… people do want to actually see and hold the item.

"We have a lot of business for that kind of stuff in our store," he continues, "but I guess, in that regard, we're looking to expand because people come to us all the time telling us our prices are phenomenal."

With strong ties to the Jewish community, Elnekave believes in the importance of doing charity work.

"These are the organizations that are run by our community, and especially because we are so much more of a store where people come to shop as opposed to [shopping] online, it makes for a very personal connection with customers and it definitely makes us want to give back to our community."

Please visit www.israelisource.com for more information, or contact 905-482-2025 or e-mail info@israelisource.com.

Invitations are ties that bind guest to simchahs

By MARNI BINDER BYK
Special to The CJN

Whether for a bar mitzvah or a wedding, invitations can be seen as the tie that binds all the guests to the party. It is saved as memorabilia and acts as a concrete reminder of the event for years to come.

Partyzazz (905-881-5736; www.partyzazz.com), a division of Henco Consulting Inc., is a full party-planning company that provides unique, individualized invitations. Working from her home studio for the last 20 years, owner Heather Hennick has been designing invitations for every event imaginable for a wide range of customers.

As a graphic designer and sign artist, she promises that her work is "anything but ordinary." She attributes her ability to create one-of-a-kind invitations to her training as a graphic designer.

"Being graphic-design specialists, we are able to work very creatively digitally, as well as having the professional know-how to lay out a simple card, giving it elegance just based on the layout," she says.

Being a creative designer and artist, she is able to satisfy special requests for creative monograms and theme designs, whether printed or just as décor for an event.

Hennick works with her clients to stay on budget. She said that in this economy, "people are still looking for creativity, but also they want someone they can rely on to do the job right the first time."

As a self-proclaimed one-stop shop, Partyzazz offers a variety of services, from calligraphy to addressing envelopes for her clients. Besides invitations and theme décor, Partyzazz creates centerpieces. In addition to being trained as a graphic artist, Hennick has a diploma from the Canadian Institute of Floral Design, which is a definite asset when she's designing centrepieces.

On her website, Hennick writes, "Any of our original designed and handcrafted invitations can be dressed with a wrap or layered or embellished with an origami flower or other creative seal."

Celebrating her 30th anniversary in the invitation business, Gilda Lefton of Stationery Plus (905-881-5588) believes that in the current challenging economy, she can add value to her clients' simchahs, because challenging economic times call for creative solutions.

In part to honour the 30th anniversary of Stationery Plus, and in part to recognize the challenge that today's economy is placing on its clients, Trans-Canada Thermographers, one of Lefton's long-time suppliers of high-quality wedding, bar/bar mitzvah and special-occasion invitations in all price ranges, is partnering with Stationery Plus to offer further generous discounts and other offers.

"Invitations do not have to carry a high price tag in order to be elegant and to really set the stage for an important milestone for a family," says Lefton. "I always do my best to work with clients and suppliers to provide invitations and accessories that send the best message to guests within the clients' price range.

"The invitation is the first thing that the guest receives to announce an event and then the guest sees that invitation on a bulletin board, a counter, or a refrigerator every day until the event, which can be six to eight weeks away. My goal is for my clients' guests to see that invitation and really look forward to a wonderful event."

She says that most of her business comes "either from referrals, or from a family that, for example, came to me for a bar or bat mitzvah and is now celebrating a wedding. Once my clients have a comfort level with me, they know that I can read their tastes and they typically return in the future."

Lefton, in addition to supplying invitation needs, also carries a wide variety of kippahs, seating cards and other accessories.

Hotel's rooftop garden provides ingredients for spa's body treatments

Spa Life

By KATHRYN KATES

Since 1928, guests have enjoyed the elegance offered at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel, and adding to the luxurious-stay experience is the 5,000-square-foot Elizabeth Milan Premier Day Spa.

Owner Elizabeth Milan has more than 30 years' experience in the beauty industry. Milan is a founding member of Premier Spas of Ontario and is former chair of the Seneca College esthetics program. She has long been considered by her peers as an esthetician's esthetician.

In 1990, Milan relocated her successful spa from midtown Toronto to the tony downtown hotel. Michelin Guide lists Elizabeth Milan Spa as "a must-see in Toronto."

The beauty expert's clientele includes the rich and famous such as actor Jennifer Lopez, opera star Placido Domingo and, fittingly, for the Fairmont Royal York Hotel… the Duchess of York.

"In a hotel, a lot of people seem very intimidated. Perhaps they've never been to a spa before, so we want our clients to feel welcomed and comforted," says Milan. "I need them to feel that we are professional and that we stay on top of all the health issues, for example our Jacuzzis blow out air, instead of holding the water, so bacteria can not breed."

The environmentally inspired green-walled spa has Asian décor accents. There are 11 treatment rooms, including two wet rooms with therapeutic baths and a special VIP Royal Vault Suite, a pedicure room, three manicure stations, full-service hair salon, a retail space and relaxing lounge area. Presently, there are 24 on staff including six estheticians. Hotel guests make up 20 per cent of their business, the rest local, and 25 per cent of the business is from men.

At the full-service spa, Milan uses Dr. Renaud and Guinot products from France in her treatments, as well as 24-karat gold flakes in the Royal Thai Gold Facial, which she discovered while in Thailand. Natural ingredients are also used at the spa, including honey from the hotel's rooftop garden, incorporated into the Honey and Milk Pedicure and the Honey and Milk Body Heaven – a body treatment that's out of this world. Milan also uses rich chocolate, which is a great antioxidant, in her signature Chocolate Body Indulgence treatment.

"Signature treatments build the business," says Milan. "When we started with our signature Chocolate Body Indulgence, all of a sudden body treatments became one of our biggest offerings. We research all our ingredients to make sure our treatments give results."

The Elizabeth Milan Premier Day Spa offers an array of packages, including the most popular Girl's Day Out and the Executive Spa Day, and four different packages for couples.

The Fairmont Royal York Hotel is just blocks from the theatre district, the CN Tower, the Rogers Centre, the Air Canada Centre and the St. Lawrence Market.

The beautifully renovated 28-storey landmark hotel was once the tallest building in the Commonwealth. The dog-friendly property has 1,365 guest rooms, including 191 suites and 82 Fairmont Gold rooms that mix Old World charm with modern conveniences. Among its many accolades, the hotel was listed on the National Geographic Traveler's "Stay List" in 2008.

The hotel's many amenities include a health club, a business centre and the Fairmont Gold Floor, where guests can enjoy complimentary continental breakfast in a private lounge and get on-floor check-in and private concierge service.

The hotel's concierge staff can arrange for coveted tickets to everything from sporting events to the theatre, including great seats to The Sound of Music at the Princess of Wales Theatre. They can even make sure you arrive in style by booking you a limo from Rosedale Livery.

The hotel has nine food outlets, including the Epic and Benihana Japanese Steakhouse. With advance notice, kosher meals can be ordered through the GMB Group and served to kosher guests in the hotel's restaurants.

The hotel offers a number of packages throughout 2009, including the Royal Sleepover, Love in the City and the All Inclusive Package. It includes one night of accommodation, full breakfast for two, and overnight valet parking, starting from $195. Guests can rejuvenate with the Royal Rejuvenation Package – one night of accommodation and a full breakfast for two and a $100 Elizabeth Milan Premier Day Spa certificate – from $349 per night. Special rates and discounts are being offered to Ontario and Quebec residents.

For an appointment at Elizabeth Milan Premier Day Spa, call 416-350-7500 or visit www.elizabethmilanspa.com. For hotel reservations, call 1-800-441-1414 or visit www.fairmont.com/royal.

The Perfect Dress for the Bride and her Guest

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Searching for the perfect bridal or cocktail dress can be gruelling, but we are going to try and guide you to the right place.

Ritché (416-789-4378, www.ritchebridal.com) located at 1662 Avenue Rd., has been regarded as the name for wedding dresses for over 50 years.

"My father, Jack Ritché started the line soon after he moved to Toronto in 1952," said Vivian Prussy, who runs the boutique with her husband Arthur. "He was very popular with society women, who encouraged him to open his own store."

When Ritché was opened, Jack custom designed each dress, but since his retirement, the store moved to importing European and American labels such as Pronovias Manuel Mota, Enzoani, Marisa Bridal and Maggie Sotero.

As well, Ritché carries a number of quality Canadian labels such as Alfred Sung and Paloma Blanca. "We have daughters of previous clients coming in 30 or 40 years after their mothers bought their dresses. It's thrilling to see the regeneration of our fan base."

Since going online, Ritché's innovative and up-to-date website (including Prussy's bridal blog) has been able to reach new clients as well.

"We have over 600 bridesmaid dresses to choose from," said Prussy. "The entire bridal party can get dresses with us."

While dresses are displayed in one colour, each dress can be ordered in a variety of colours.

Bridesmaid dresses take approximately eight to 12 weeks to be ordered, said Prussy, but rush orders can be accommodated at an additional cost.

The Ritché bridal salon is located on the second floor of the boutique and works by appointment so that the bride has the complete focus of Ritché's consultants. "We like to get a feel for what the bride wants so that we only show her the dresses we think she will like," said Prussy.

"We won't stop showing her dresses until she finds the perfect one."

She recommends allowing between six months and one year when ordering a wedding dress, in order to allow for alterations and final fittings.

"A team of seamstresses makes sure that every bride looks just right walking down the aisle," said Prussy. "When the bride finally finds that dress and her parents start to get teary, that's the most thrilling moment for us."

If special occasion dressing is what you seek, look no further than Madeline's (416-789-4890). Located at 1841 Avenue Rd., Madeline's carries a wide range of ladies formalwear, from cocktail dresses to mother-of-the-bride and evening gowns. Imported from France, Italy, Spain, New York and Los Angeles, Madeline's carries all the leading names in the business today.

"We carry every size from 0-24 and can customize to fit as well," said Cerra. With a resident seamstress at the ready, as well as a selection of jewellery and accessories, Madeline's is truly a one-stop-shop.

The boutique, which has been going strong for over four years, is the brainchild of Madeline Cerra and her husband Nick. With Madeline's fashion knowledge (having studied fashion design at the International Academy) and Nick's business sense, the two make the perfect team.

"My husband and I are passionate about what we do, so combining our interests into opening the store was made to be," said Cerra.

While the boutique originally carried a small selection of custom wedding dresses designed by Madeline, the two decided to delve right into eveningwear earlier this year. "The most fun for us is dressing women for parties. They are coming in for happy occasions and so they are happy as well."

At Madeline's, you can be assured that you will never be pressured into buying a trendy dress. "We are completely honest with our customers. We don't try to sell our clients something unless we think they look gorgeous. We understand that it's hard to find the perfect dress, and we hope to put a smile on your face."

Flowers and décor are the finishing touches for your wedding

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Floral and set designs are integral in making your wedding a night to remember.

If anyone knows their lilies from lilacs, it's Fran Sackler (905 884-5848, www.fsflorals.com), who has been dreaming up floral arrangements for over 40 years.

Trained in London's west end, Sackler moved here and became the resident florist at William Ashley's Bloor Street location.

Wanting to pursue her passion on her own terms, Sackler decided to launch her company from her home and hasn't looked back since. Starting with just a few clients, she is now booked for over 70 events a year.

"I couldn't have been doing this for all these years if I didn't love what I do," she said. "It's the look on the bride's face when she sees what you've done – it just grabs your heart every time."

Sackler transforms your dreams into reality, every step of the way. Beginning with a complimentary consultation, she taps into your vision and personality so that your ideas are translated to the fullest while working within your budget.

"We don't believe in offering packaged deals because every bride wants something different."

From centrepieces to corsages and boutonnieres (the latter of which she includes for free), Sackler can do just about anything. "We even have our own outdoor chupah which we can redesign for each wedding."

Designs by Karen Baker

Sackler's services continue through the wedding day so she can transfer the arrangements from the ceremony to the dining room.

"We don't leave until the room looks perfect," she said.

At a recent wedding, the hall hadn't followed through on their decoration of the head table. "We were about to leave when I looked back and saw this sad looking table. I couldn't leave until it looked as beautiful as the rest of the room, so we decorated it as our special gift to the bride".

Trends come and go, said Sackler, but what really works the best is simple elegance."

While she cites exotic trims and feathers as being popular this year, Sackler notes that foliage is actually the most crucial factor in the mix. "While adding much needed natural definition to your arrangements, a touch of green goes a long way to cutting down your costs."

Sackler said that floral arrangements should compliment the event, rather than being its focus. "You don't need to spend a lot to achieve the look you want. Remember, you'll need the money for everything that follows the wedding day."

Once you've got your flowers covered, you'll need to get on with the rest of the room – and we've got just the expert for you. Designs by Karen Baker (905-886- 8100, www.designsbykarenbaker.com) is a virtual one-stop-shop for event room décor from props to lights to table settings and arrangements. For over 25 years, Baker has been transforming ordinary spaces into one-of-a-kind weddings, bat/bat mitzvahs, corporate parties and the like.

"I always had unique ideas as well as a strong sense of design," said Baker, about launching her own company. "Since then, I've done all sorts of parties for everyone from Barbra Streisand to Mats Sundin to the Blue Jays," said Baker.

Strong sense of design

"We like to give you a completely customized look," she said, adding that furniture and custom artwork can be worked into the event.

"I don't like to repeat the same idea. It's always great to experiment with new ideas; our clients love that."

Such ideas include a recent Chef Challenge Indian themed dinner for the Food Network, and an Aspen Lodge themed party.

"We draped the entire room in chocolate chiffon and created mini forests throughout the room using real evergreens and birch trees, and fake snow," she said.

"The tables had ice sculptures in the shape of the Rockies, surrounded by moss and other outdoor and natural materials."

While the details usually take a few months to co-ordinate, Baker can easily fit in last minute events, such as baby-namings and brit milahs.

"I really like to cater to the individual. People want to feel like you are completely focused on their event, and when they've waited 13 years to make their son's bar mitzvah, it's really got to be special."

Baker attributes her success to her ability to give her clients exactly what they want, with patience and ease.

"Sometimes they aren't even sure how to describe it," she said. "When the least creative person in the room likes what you've done, you know you've done something right."

Fran Sackler: "Every bride wants something different."

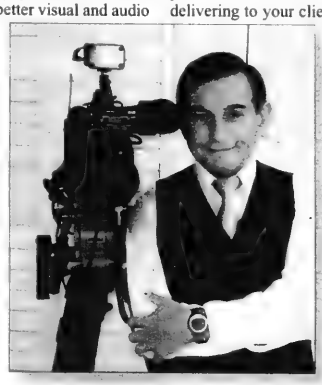
Professional videographers use the latest equipment

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Few industries have gone through as rapid a transition as the video industry. Except perhaps for computers, video technology has arguably the fastest growth rate of any commercial endeavour, with equipment formats that seem to upgrade every year, offering better visual and audio quality and more overall options for both professional and consumer use.

Josh Israel of Videos by Josh (905-709-9277; e-mail videoby-josh@hotmail.com) has been through countless technological upgrades and video formats during his 30-year career as a videographer for private and corporate events. His most recent transition has been to high-definition Blu-ray video, the next big thing to hit digital video after the DVD. Israel admits it's been difficult having to keep up with changing trends because the technology evolves so quickly, not to mention that it means major financial investment each time. But he stresses that it's a necessary step if you want to remain on the cutting edge.



Josh Israel of Videos by Josh

"A lot of clients don't realize how much is invested," he says, "and, of course, there's a learning curve every time technology changes [and] all of our equipment has to be sold. But every time there's a major leap in technology, I find our clients are looking for the latest and the best, and those are the clients we've been after – the ones who are really up-to-date and are aware of what's going on and know what they want."

Israel works out of his Thornhill, Ont., studio, where he encourages clients to make an appointment to drop by and preview the tools he works with, an important part of the process when deciding what is best suited for a client's specific needs. Israel wants customers to be familiar and comfortable with his approach to videography, as well as to know exactly what they're going to be getting for their money.

"The most satisfied customers, of course, come back for the next event, and that's been the big success with my business – repeat customers. I don't have to go out there and advertise too much or twist people's arms to get their business."

Rich Saunders of Redstone Pictures (416-256-4666) has been in the videography business for two decades. During that time, he's seen 26 different camera formats come and go, including Beta, VHS, 8-millimetre, 16-millimetre, DVX and DVC-Pro. He says he was also the first to embrace non-linear editing techniques that are now a staple of the industry.

"I think the latest round of changes are phenomenal" Saunders says. "The hi-def stuff just blows you away. What you can do, the flexibility you have, the quality that you're delivering to your client – it's just exceptional."

Saunders also agrees with Israel regarding the necessity of upgrading to high-definition video, which is, in his opinion, not only the most recent option, but also the most convenient and practical one.

"It's expensive, but it's faster, and you're not using tape, so in the long run, it becomes more economical."

These days, people with a bit of cash can get their hands on decent "prosumer" cameras that mimic the real deal and, with access to editing software, can post their creations on video sites such as YouTube and Flickr. Despite this, Israel believes there's still a demand for a professional touch that you can't get with a novice cameraman or filmmaker. Someone with a trained eye for quality can spot the difference between a professional job and a novice one, and he's convinced this sentiment extends to professional reliability as well.

"As far as quality competition goes, there's very little of it… a great many do not recognize video quality unless it's pointed out to them… [but] people are more concerned about overall reliability than they are about visual or audio quality."

Saunders takes this approach one step further, explaining that he embraces the competition because of the challenge it presents to him both as an artist and as a businessman.

"I always liked it when someone came along and tried to do what we were doing, because it made us work harder, it made us work smarter, it made us more creative… and what that means is better value for the clients."

With the current recession, economically conscious individuals tend to be a bit conservative when it comes to shelling out for unnecessary frills. Israel understands that money can sometimes be an issue, but still feels the need to stress the old adage that you get what you pay for, and this certainly extends to the world of corporate and private video. He says the price tag should come second when seeking the best product to suit the occasion.

"A lot of people who are first-timers, who have never done this before, all they look for is price, and a lot of people out there will give them that high price. But the final product won't always be equal to the price paid."

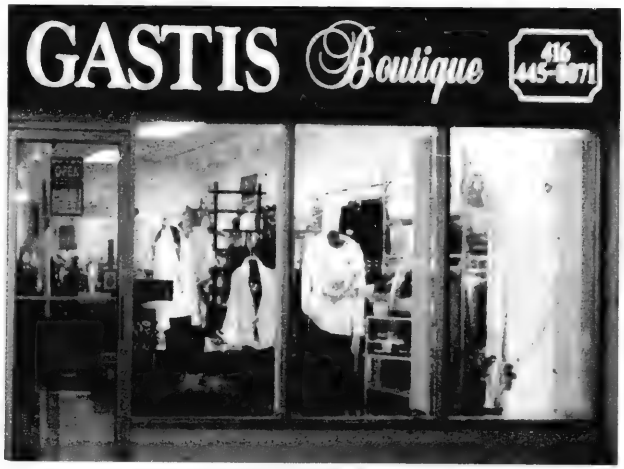
Gastis' Boutique carries all the hottest European and Canadian names.



A simplified search for the perfect outfit

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

As we gird for a jammed-packed summer of simchahs, the most important question that comes to mind (okay, perhaps only for women) is "what am I going to wear?"

Since the search for a perfect outfit can be like finding a needle in a haystack, we've scouted two of the best boutiques in the city.

For more than 20 years, Gastis' Boutique (416-445-8071) has been giving women what they want, at the prices they want. Now located at 660 Finch Ave. E. in the Bayview Woods Plaza, Gastis' built its reputation at the prestigious Inn on the Park Hotel.

"When the hotel was closing, I found this plaza and went to ask HairAfter for information about the location," says Sam Srour, the boutique's owner. "When I walked into the salon, I started to see all of my clients, so the move was actually fate!"

Carrying all the hottest European and Canadian names in women's fashion, including Simon Chang, Spanner Ltd. and Mammoliti, Gastis' always offers its merchandise at a fraction of what it costs elsewhere. "What we save in rent, we give as discounts to our customers," says Srour. "That's what makes shopping with us so worthwhile – our clients know that they are getting a great deal."

An experience with Gastis' is seamless from start to finish. Carefully selected, the collections are offset by complementary accessories and jewelry. A new addition to the boutique's roster is Joseph Ribkoff, a line of dressy and casual suits and dresses.

Unique fashions for unique women

Because of Gastis' previous involvement with the travel industry, any size can be ordered in within 24 hours. The boutique is also staffed with a seamstress who can further customize your look.

The friendly in-store atmosphere is what Gastis' reputation has been built on. "It's important to us that our customers feel at home. We never pressure them into buying anything and so they respect our opinion", says Srour. "Through the years, our customers have become our family and friends."

No quest for the perfect outfit would be complete without a visit to K. Barketti (www.kbarketti.com). With locations at Bayview Village (416-225-6733) and Square One Shopping Centre (416- 896-3887), the boutique is a one-stop shop for special-occasion dressing, including mother-of-the-bride gowns, bar/bat mitzvah suits and cocktail dresses.

While the boutique's first inception on Bloor Street more than 30 years ago featured mainstream women's fashions, the majority of the clothing currently carried by K.Barketti is exclusively designed for the boutique by resident designer Velika Kosteski.

A graduate of fashion design at George Brown College, Kosteski worked under several designers before joining the Barketti team, where she has designed dresses for various Canadian celebrities, including singer Amy Sky.

"Our merchandise is so unique that we can guarantee that you will never come to a party and be wearing the same thing as someone else," says Terrie Walia, the boutique's owner.

Since the company operates as a boutique as well as a manufacturer, Kosteski also does custom work by appointment – creating your look from scratch. She works closely with your concept, you can pick the fabric and the styling can be adjusted to suit your fancy.

K.Barketti: Unique fashions, exclusively designed.

"We can translate your idea into reality, so you get exactly what you are dreaming of," says Walia. "The ability to offer that is very unique nowadays."

In store, K.Barketti carries sizes two to 26 – other sizes can easily be ordered by measurement.

"We take pride in the fact that we can accommodate women of any shape or size for any occasion," says Walia. "Shopping with us is a truly unique experience."

Longtime names in men's suits

By Randi Bergman
Special to The CJN

A quality suit says a lot about the man wearing it. Since locating such a suit can be a bit rough these days, we're going help you find it at two Toronto stores of long standing.

Myles launched his Yonge Street store – now located at 380 Millway Ave. in Vaughan, Ont. – in 1961, and it quickly became the place to shop for fine quality men's clothes.

"I think most people in the business would agree that Lou changed the way men dressed," says his wife, Wendy Myles, who co-runs the business. "He was and still is tremendously influential."

Lou Myles and his wife, Wendy

In 1969, the Lou Myles look became official when the designer opened his own Toronto-based factory, which then shipped to retail giants across the United States including Saks Fifth Avenue and Neiman Marcus.

"Our suits are handmade, hand -basted – no computerization involved," Wendy Myles says.

Wendy Myles breaks down the Lou Myles look into two categories. First, it's the distinct silhouette that sets the suits apart. "We can make a bad figure look good and a good figure look great!" she says. Then, the shoulder line must remain straight, regardless of trend. "The collar of a well-made suit always hugs the neck."

Tom Mihalik

"People come from all over to buy a Lou Myles Suit," she says. Recalling a radio broadcast reporting on an upcoming Yankees-Blue Jays game, she adds that "the Yankees were excited to come to Toronto just so they could shop at our store!"

Among Myles' distinguished clients over the years were Frank Sinatra, Mohammed Ali and former prime minister Pierre Trudeau, who wore a Lou Myles suit on the cover of Time magazine.

As well as the retail storefront, Myles runs a by-appointment-only private showroom in The Colonnade on Bloor, where suits and tuxedos are made to measure. One hundred per cent made in Canada, the suits take approximately four to six weeks to be finished.

"Trends come and go, but to us, that's mere decoration," Myles says. "A great suit is always going to be a great suit."

Anyone seeking quality on a budget need look no further than Tom's Place (416-596-0297, http://www.toms-place.com). Located at 190 Baldwin St. in Kensington Market, the store has been a Toronto institution since 1958.

"My father emigrated from Hungary to try and find a better life in Canada," says Tom Mihalik, the store's owner. "They gave us a chance back then and we're still here!"

With the addition of Mihalik's son, Tom Jr., to the team, Tom's Place is in its third generation of family management.

"It's a wonderful feeling to know that the people of Toronto have been so loyal to us," Mihalik says. "We like to cater to everyone – from the politician to the regular guy."

Tom's Place, which celebrated its 50th anniversary last year, is your destination for suits, shirts and ties, as well as discount women's designer labels, at one heck of a cost.

"Tom is my name, but it also stands for Take Off More!" Mihalik says with a chuckle. With no firm prices in the store, all merchandise is up for the haggle. "We appreciate that everybody wants a deal, and in this economy, they actually need it."

The store's first floor features an incredible five-for-one suit deal section that remains all year round. Dubbed "Fashion at the Top," the store's second floor features high-end designer labels, which are also offered at jaw-dropping prices.

"People are taking their jobs much more seriously lately, and it's important to them to dress appropriately," Mihalik says. "Dressing in a quality suit signifies that you are dressing for today and also for tomorrow."

Mihalik cites narrow lapels and shorter jackets as popular features. "Since the silhouette fits much closer to the body these days, you can really tell a well-tailored suit from a poorly made one."

Since experienced tailors are on the premises, a perfect fit is never impossible.

"It's rare to have such experienced tailors anymore, but it's so important," he says.

The Mihaliks' success can be attributed to their general passion for what they do, as well as a drive to succeed. "I think we have survived all these years because of our vision and hard work," Mihalik says. "We are very thankful to still be an integral part of the city's Jewish community – we need a voice now more than ever!"

Mint specializes in live entertainment and alternatives

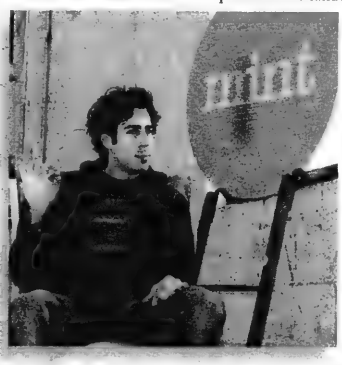
By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Mint brings a wide roster of services, including MCs, DJs and dance troupes.

"If you like to party and have a good time, you're in our demographic," says Jordan Fogle, owner of Mint Entertainment, a company that caters to the needs of those looking for a fresh approach to special events, whatever the occasion.

Mint (416-923-MINT (6468); www.mintevents.ca) specializes in bringing the client a wide roster of services, including music options such as live MCs, DJs, dance troupes and bands, as well as performance artists such as magicians and hypnotists. The company also excels in a host of live-event alternatives, everything and anything from lighting and video effects, customized stage props, casino programming, celebrity appearances and various game and carnival activities.

Mint is a relatively recent brand, having only been around for five years, but Fogle (jordan@mintevents.ca) already has his ambitions set high, dipping into a variety of different categories, including a youth division, focusing mainly on bar and bat mitzvahs, a wedding division for the college-age crowd, and a corporate division for a variety of business-related events.



Jordan Fogle: Not where he intended to be.

Fogle has rubbed some pretty impressive elbows in the past, notably at a Hollywood party last year for the première of the film The Wrestler, which saw the likes of actors Mickey Rourke, Jennifer Aniston, Sean Penn and Keira Knightley making appearances. This year, Fogle is planning a party series at the Hazelton Hotel in downtown Toronto, which hopefully will go off just as well.

Fogle never initially intended to end up where he is, however. In fact, in university he was majoring in political science and philosophy and was planning to go into law, but it was his minor in marketing that ended up taking him in a completely different direction. His exposure to the world of corporate event planning and advertising opened up a whole new range of possibilities, and he followed through on his goal of becoming the best in his field.

Fogle began his career in the entertainment industry working with Jared Florence of Entertainment Extreme, which later merged with Mandell Entertainment, a big wheel in the party business. Five years ago, Mint purchased Mandell Entertainment's private business division, specializing in weddings and bar mitzvahs, which, in Fogle's words, "gave us fuel to ignite our fire." Although his headquarters are in Toronto, Fogle doesn't limit himself to just one region. Mint has branched out all over North America, including most of Canada, as well as the United States, with events in New York, Los Angeles, Phoenix and Texas.

In addition to its entertainment and event-planning sector, Mint opened an agency division last year that specializes in licensing, branding, promotions, broadcasting and integrated marketing.

"Some of our direction now is going with marketing initiatives and PR and branding and on the other side, Mint events. It's flying away right now with the bar and bat mitzvahs and a lot more corporate work these days," Fogle says. "The direction is to just keep doing what we're doing but to really expand our corporate portfolio while servicing all of the private and social events."

The truffles –chocolates with soft creamy centres encased in a chocolate shell – are all made from scratch on the premises. "We make truffles the old-fashioned way with a pot over the stove. We make a real ganache, a combination of chocolate and cream."

And there's no skimping on ingredients. "Our truffles are made with fresh cream and genuine liqueurs.

"We use a single-malt scotch in our Irish cream and real champagne in our champagne truffles. They are by far the most popular truffles in the shop," Levine says.

Smash cakes – they add an element of fun to bar and bat mitzvahs – the large hollow chocolate rectangular box-style cakes, have been in great demand since the late 1980s, says Levine.

"For the chocolate box, we use the same high-quality European chocolate. We decorate the cake with all kinds of shapes, and the names are all in chocolate.The letters stand up. We provide a mallet. You can't cut the cake. You have to smash it."

Chocolate Charm's huge variety of chocolate lollipops make great party favours, says Levine. "We have the largest collection of chocolate lollipops in the city. They come in all kinds of shapes."

And you can find the same variety in the chocolate novelty shapes that are used for greetings and gifts. They can be personalized and delivered. Levine recommends that customers give the store a day's notice for personalized items.

People love to get chocolate as gifts because it "is known to be the most universally loved flavour," he says, adding that the novelties are not something people buy for themselves. "It's more of a fun thing. It's nice to get the shape they like in chocolate."

During the holidays, religious symbols are very common gifts, says Levine "People like to send chocolateshaped shofars at Rosh Hashanah and solid chocolate seder plates with the chocolate 10 plagues. We have a symbol for each plague."

He notes that chocolate flowers are a trend."Long-stem roses and daisies, and tulips and daffodils sent in clay pots make wonderful house-warming and holiday gifts. Our flowers don't wilt."

Chocolate Charm has a line of parve chocolates. Gianduja, which combines chocolate and hazelnut paste, "is "the closest you can get to something tasting like milk chocolate in a parve chocolate," says Levine.

While people are more health conscious, they still like to indulge in chocolate, so he offers some healthier options such as chocolate-covered nuts, dried fruit and almond bark. "The research shows that chocolate is actually good for you. Almond bark is a nice, healthy snack."

Chocolate Charm delivers across the Greater Toronto Area. "We get calls from all over the city," Levine says. "People want chocolate without milk because there are so many people who are lactose intolerant."

He says the packaging of the chocolates is attractive. "We use top-notch gold boxes with handmade bows."

"We ship across Canada. People tell us they have to have our chocolate."

Entertainment kids won't soon forget

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Kids can be choosy when it comes to entertainment, but at least two local companies aim to give them an experience they won't soon forget.

Whimz (416-656-7894; e-mail: whimz@whimzonline.com), for example, is more than just a mobile zoo in that the staff members are committed to an interactive educational experience in which they teach understanding and respect for animals, as well as debunk the popular misconceptions associated with many of them.

The interactive aspect of seeing an animal up close, as opposed to simply reading about it in a textbook, is what owner Tracy Guerin believes makes the learning experience that much more indelible for both children and adults.

"People are blown away by how soft a chinchilla is, or that snakes are not slimy, or how incredibly beautiful a red-eyed tree frog is… there are just so many opportunities," she says.

Whimz has 12 trained staff members working either full or part time. Some of them have used their experience at Whimz as credits toward their teaching degrees in biology and animal sciences. But, according to Guerin, having a strong academic background really comes as a secondary qualification.

"The first and foremost qualification here," she says, "is that you have to love working with children. The majority of our clients are children, and we're committed to their overall experience – that they have fun, that they learn something and that it's safe."

Guerin admits that caring for animals can be tricky, as they require constant attention, feeding and grooming. Some of the 23 available animals are purchased from pet stores, but most come from breeders, ensuring that Whimz has them from a very young age so they can be properly trained to interact with humans.

"We're very sensitive to the needs of the animals and that they're as happy as possible," Guerin says, "because if the animal's happy, then the client will be happy. If the animal's skittish and nervous and defending itself, where's the fun in that?"

Another important aspect of the business is reliability and professionalism, specifically that adults can be assured that their children will be taken care of for an hour and that staff will always show up for booked appointments.

Whimz also has programs for adults, seniors and special needs individuals that differ significantly from their children's programs. For instance, corporate events tend to lean toward team-building exercises in Fear Factor-style contests to overcome common phobias.

Fear is fostered through ignorance," Guerin says. "The more you understand, the more the fear diminishes. I know that because I was terrified of spiders before I started working with the tarantulas, and now I'm not afraid of them. I don't love them, but I'm not afraid of them."

Melanie Marcus got her introduction to henna art on a visit to Paris in 1998. While there, she saw a street performer doing henna tattoo art, and Marcus asked the woman to teach her the tricks of the trade. After a few pointers, Marcus bought some henna ink and Little Miss Henna (905-731-0067; e-mail: info@littlemisshenna.com) was born. Twelve years later, it's still as popular with the kids as ever.

Animal and henna fun

Along with henna, Marcus does body-art tattoos, made of alcohol-based body paint. They glow in the dark, are multicoloured and last from five to seven days.

Marcus says that the great thing about henna and body-art tattoos is that they're temporary.

Tattoos are only the beginning for this brand, however. On Marcus' website (www.littlemisshenna.com), visitors can check out dozens of innovative ideas that can liven up any event.

I'm constantly travelling" she says, "and I'm always looking for innovative, new ideas for the Toronto market, for the bar and bat mitzvah circuit… it can be from airbrushing or garments like T-shirts and hats and pyjama bottoms. We actually airbrush designs on these items, and the kids get to choose from whichever ones they want."

It's also an interactive experience, since it's done on the spot by the staff and the options are open for kids to have their say.

"They get to participate as well," says Marcus. "It's not just something we've bought and are giving to them – they have their input and they get to choose what they would like on their T-shirt or their hat, and we actually sit there at their party and paint on these garments for the kids."

Little Miss Henna has a team of 30 workers and trains all its staff members – all of whom come from artistic backgrounds in airbrushing, hot pressing and body art.

"The staff that I hire are outgoing and personable," Marcus says, "whether we get them from OCAD [Ontario College of Art and Design] or they're just local artists around the area. They're always looking for something fresh and something fun to do."

PARTY PLANNER

Bringing the downtown spa treatment to you

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Somewhere between calling the caterer and the florist and calling the shots, you have to carve out a little "me" time when you are planning your family simchah.

It's not as if you have to be reminded that you deserve it, but you do have to be told that it's OK! With all the stress that comes with planning an event, whether it's a simple birthday party or a formal wedding, taking a little spa time isn't a luxury, it's a necessity.

Our first suggestion doesn't even involve getting out of bed! Waxy Taxi (416-638-6149) is, as the name suggests, a full-service moving wax-mobile! Specializing in total waxing (that means anywhere, ladies!) as well as manicures, Lori Greenwood brings the spa to you.

"There is something really nice and intimate about having your treatments done in the comfort of your own home," she says. "There's no muss, no fuss, no pretence of a spa."

Equipped with her top-notch utensils and products, Greenwood travels across the greater Toronto area, including Thornhill and Richmond Hill. "I can even heat the wax from my car!" she says with a laugh.

Trained in esthetics more than 25 years ago, Greenwood moved from a salon to working from home so that she could raise her two young daughters. A true multitasker, she managed her in-house studio while teaching esthetics, waxing and manicuring.

A few years ago, Greenwood decided to take her show on the road and started Waxy Taxi. "When I was working from my home, I was able to work at something I loved while being around my family," she says. "Now I'm reversing that comfort for my clients."

"I love to work with groups of girls and women, teaching them how to shape their eyebrows," she says.

Greenwood can travel to offices, nursing homes and schools. "It's a nice break for clients in the middle of a stressful work day, as well as for those young mothers or elderly people who can't leave the house."

Staying up to date on new techniques and hygiene are of the utmost importance to Greenwood. Waxing applicators are never reused, and utensils are always sanitized between uses.

"I always treat my clients exactly how I would want to be treated," she says. "It's important that they should be completely comfortable."

After so many years, Greenwood is as passionate about her job as ever. "I now have the pleasure of having my clients as my friends as well."

If you prefer to get out of the house, head on over to Uptown Spa (416-449-4044, www.uptownspa.com), at 801 York Mills Rd., Suite 311.

Dubbed the "neighbourhood spa," Uptown is a full-service, upscale day spa, without the stuffiness.

"We are very relaxed and friendly," says Anne Sorenson, the spa's owner. "We don't want anyone to feel like they don't belong here."

In the business for more than 28 years, Sorenson left her previous spa to launch Uptown 15 years ago, with her daughter Carrie Jenkins.

Since then, the spa has expanded to the 7,000-square-foot facility that it is today, offering every service from various body treatments to Botox and teeth whitening, as well as manicures and pedicures. Uptown also offers several customized services for men, such as therapeutic massage, reflexology and hand and foot care.

Uptown is known for its facials and massages, which are among its specialties. Massages includes hot stone treatment and private Whirlpool.

To usher in a season in the sun, Sorenson cites body treatments such as salt glow, moor mud wraps and body scrubs as the best way to get rid of dead skin and clear your body of the winter blues. And with the long winter finally over, the self-tanning facility will give you a head start on that summer glow you've been dreaming of.

Uptown offers gift certificates as well as a number of pampering packages that are perfect for bridal parties.

"We love to celebrate with our clients," Sorenson says. "People bring in wine and food while we work away on relieving their stress!"

In order not to interfere with last minute details however, Sorenson suggests coming a few days prior to your event for longer, more relaxing services.

With its personal touch, Uptown Spa promises to make your experience as pleasurable as possible.

"Everyone in the area knows that we are the place to be!"

Party venues on Eglinton West and in Greektown

The Eglinton Grand.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

You don't actually have to travel across the Mediterranean to feel like you're in Greece.

You can enjoy authentic Greek cuisine at the Palace (416-462-1166), located at 722 Pape Ave. in the heart of Greektown.

The Palace, which has a private room that can accommodate from 20 to 75 people with room for musicians, suits engagement, anniversary and graduation parties as well as bar and bat mitzvahs.

Eglinton Grand
- Fully Kosher Facility
- Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- Kosher Event Catering Available
- Capacity up to 100 People
- 100-300 Person Capacity
- Over 300 Person Capacity
- Wheelchair Accessible

Open for lunch and dinner daily, the restaurant is known for its Mediterranean fare, says owner Peter Hadjis. "We make everything here."

And it's very much a family operation with his son, John, helping to run the business, while his wife, Stella, and his sister, Olga, prepare traditional recipes in the kitchen. "They make the best spanakopita." Spanakopita is a delicious phyllo pastry dish made with spinach and feta cheese.

Hadjis says that high quality and fresh ingredients are the key to the Palace's reputation for fine cuisine. "I go myself every day to get the fish. We never ask for the price just the quality."

He says the Palace offers the best and freshest fish, with such fish dishes as sea bass tilapia, halibut and salmon, he says.

Of course, the menu includes traditional Mediterranean fare like filet mignon, rib steak, rack of lamb, and chicken and lamb kebob, made fresh on the grill and accompanied by a crisp salad. "We make the best Greek salad. We use a homemade olive oil oregano dressing."

Other traditional Greek dishes on the menu include moussaka, a beef dish made with eggplant and potatoes, and roasted leg of lamb. Appetizers such as the popular lemon soup, tzatziki, hummus and eggplant salad are all made on the premises.

Hadjis, who emigrated from Greece in 1965, says, he had plenty of training at the finest hotels in both Athens and Toronto before opening the Palace in 1983."I worked at the best hotels and I learned from the best chefs."

For those people who love history and classic design, the Palace is a party venue that takes you back in time to the glamour of the Art Deco era.

The Eglinton Grand (416-485-5900) formerly the Eglinton Theatre (400 Eglinton Ave. W.) is a heritage building that has been restored to its original 1937 grandeur.

The elegance and sophistication of this facility, with its ballroom and balcony, is a venue well-suited for bar and bat mitzvahs and weddings, says Dino Lucchetto, marketing and sales manager. "The beauty is that you don't have to share the facility with another party. It's exclusively yours for the evening.

"The elegant décor, with its rich mahogany and ebony wood, and marble, and period furniture, does not require a lot of décor, says Lucchetto. "The room stunning as is."

He points out that the two statues in the main reception area are from the old Eglinton Theatre, as are the handrails and light fixtures.

The framing around the original screen, which is now a painted mural, makes a striking backdrop for the head table, says Lucchetto, noting that the balcony level is an ideal cocktail area. "It gives the party that wow effect."

He stresses that all meals are prepared fresh on site. "We always get great reviews for our food and service."

He adds that the kitchen can also be kashered. " We have a mashgiach on site, and Zuchter Berk does all our kosher catering."

Palace Restaurant
- Fully Kosher Facility

The venue, which is owned by the Dynamic Hospitality and Entertainment Group, can accommodate sit-down dinners from 100 to 320 guests or 500 for a cocktail reception. An additional room with a capacity for 225 guests can be utilized for wedding ceremonies or bar or bat mitzvah services.

Non-kosher catering packages for a four-course meal on a Saturday evening start at $95 for a main course of chicken, veal, salmon, which includes a seven-hour open bar.

For an additional $10, the main course can be upgraded to a chicken combo with tenderloin and rack of lamb, and the meal will include a fresh fruit and pastry table, says Lucchetto. "It's our most popular package."

Buchenwald rebukes Holocaust deniers: Obama

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Buchenwald concentration camp "is the ultimate rebuke" to those who deny the Holocaust, U.S. President Barack Obama said during his visit to the camp last Friday.

Obama toured the site with German Chancellor Angela Merkel and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel, and they laid roses at a memorial there. An estimated 56,000 people, including some 11,000 Jews, perished at Buchenwald at the hands of the Nazis.

"To this day, there are those who insist the Holocaust never happened," Obama said. "This place is the ultimate rebuke to such thoughts, a reminder of our duty to confront those who would tell lies about our history."

It was a pointed message to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has expressed doubts that six million Jews died at the hands of the Nazis.

"He should make his own visit to Buchenwald," Obama told NBC in an interview prior to his visit. "I have no patience for people who would deny history."

At the camp, a sombre Obama told reporters that his great-uncle had helped liberate a nearby satellite camp, Ohrdruf, just days before other U.S. army units overran Buchenwald. His great-uncle returned from war and was unable to speak of the horrible scene, Obama said.

He added that both the victims and the perpetrators at the camp alike were humans, and everyone must stand guard against a repeat.

Jews fight anti-Israel messaging at Pride Parade

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Jewish gays and lesbians are mobilizing against plans by anti-Israel gay activists to try to turn Toronto's 2009 Pride Parade into a public forum for bashing Israel.

One of the Canadian gay community's most celebrated events, the annual Toronto Pride Parade and Pride Week – scheduled this year to run from June 19 to June 28 – is supposed to showcase the community's commitment to "equality, human rights, respect, diversity, honour, love and acceptance," according to Pride Toronto's website.

However, members of the Jewish gay communities in both Toronto and Montreal have voiced concerns over the increasing presence of virulent, anti-Israel political messaging that has sprouted up at the parade since the middle part of the decade.

Tracey Sandilands

In recent years, anti-Israel groups in Toronto have slipped into the parade without permission from organizers, their members bearing signs denouncing Israel as an apartheid state.

But one of those groups, calling itself Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA), will be officially welcomed by Pride Toronto as a participant this year.

Last week, Tracey Sandilands, executive director of Pride Toronto, confirmed that QuAIA's application has "been accepted" and the group will participate in the 2009 Toronto parade.

Word of the news spread quickly to Montreal's Jewish gay community, with some members afraid that Montreal Pride week

The News in Brief

CANADA

Firms Get Grant

TORONTO — Two firms, one Israeli and one Canadian, have received a grant from the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF) to create products to assess the risk of pre-eclampsia, a potentially fatal condition for women and fetuses during pregnancy. Diagnostic Technologies Ltd., which makes diagnostic devices for high-risk pregnancies, and Canadian partner Miraculins Inc. got $782,000 for their $1.6-million joint project, the firms said last month. The CIIRDF was formed in 1994 to promote research and development between Israeli and Canadian companies.

News Head Hopeful

TORONTO — The managing director of Al Jazeera English told the Toronto Star last week that he's hopeful the news channel will be approved for broadcast in Canada. Tony Burman, a former senior CBC news executive, said the Qatar-based network could air on Canadian cable and satellite carriers as early as the fall if the channel gets regulatory approval this month or next. He made the comments ahead of the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission's June 8 deadline for written comments on Al Jazeera's application. After objections by Jewish groups to an application by its Arabic parent channel, the latter was approved for broadcast in 2004 on the condition that carriers censor hate speech, but they said the condition was too onerous.

JFS Receives Funds

OTTAWA — Ottawa's Jewish Family Services (JFS) received a $266,649 grant from the province's Newcomer Settlement Program (NSP) on May 27. Ontario's minister of citizenship and immigration, Michael Chan, and local MPP Jim Watson were on hand to present the grant and tour JFS facilities. The NSP funds community-based, not-for-profit organizations that help immigrants.

Zareinu Snags Cash

TORONTO — Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto has received a grant of $276,000 over five years from the Ontario Trillium Foundation to raise its profile in the community and provide more hands-on programs and services to children with special needs, Zareinu said last week. The grant from the provincial body is the largest in Zareinu's history, the 19-year-old Jewish agency said.

WORLD

New German Rabbis

BERLIN — The first two graduates of a new Orthodox seminary in Berlin were ordained June 2 as rabbis in a ceremony broadcast live on German TV from Munich's new synagogue. Zsolt Balla, 30, and Avraham Radbill, 25, graduated from the Rabbinerseminar zu Berlin and are the first Orthodox rabbis to be ordained in Germany in more than 70 years.

Court OKs Pensions

BERLIN — A German court ruled last week that two men forced to work for the Nazis during World War II are entitled to a pension. The precedent-setting ruling could affect thousands of survivors who could finally get German social security payments, Gideon Taylor, executive vice-president of the Claims Conference, said. It will particularly affect survivors who applied for German social security pensions and were rejected, unable to show they had worked for remuneration. Taylor said more than 90 per cent of 70,000 ghetto labourers who applied in the past were rejected. Those deemed eligible may receive up to $214 per month, plus back payments based on when they first applied. The court accepted the argument of the two survivors of ghettos in Poland that they qualified because they were compensated for work in the form of food and other amenities.

2 Jews Died in Crash

NEW YORK — Two Jews were aboard Air France Flight 447, Chabad.org reported. French businessman Serge Anidjar was travelling home from a business trip to Brazil. No information was available about a second Jew on board. The flight from Brazil to France went missing June 1 over the Atlantic Ocean after leaving Rio de Janeiro.

Cash For Security

NEW YORK — The two Bronx shuls targeted in a planned terror attack were each awarded $25,000 (US) by New York Governor David Paterson May 31 to beef up security with alarms and surveillance equipment. Four men were arrested May 20 for planting what they thought were bombs outside the Orthodox Jewish Center of Riverdale and the nearby Reform Riverdale Temple in an FBI sting operation, but the FBI had sold the men non-functioning explosives. The money will come from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security.

Academic Union Votes For Boycott – Again

LONDON — Britain's main academic union voted overwhelmingly to boycott Israeli universities and colleges.

The University and College Union passed the boycott resolution at its annual meeting last week. It's the fourth year in a row that the union has passed a resolution condemning Israel and supporting the boycott of Israeli academics and academic institutions.

The key resolution calls on UCU branches to discuss boycotting Israel, and commits the union to organize a pro-boycott conference for other trade unions to attend. The vote was then declared invalid after union attorneys said that a boycott of that kind could trigger legal action against the union. Union General Secretary Sally Hunt said she "formally and personally commended" the union for holding the debate, the Guardian reported.

The Anti-Defamation League called the move "a shameful exercise to demonize Israel and Israeli academics."

PM backs suicide bombing bill

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Since it was introduced in 2005, five past prime ministers have signed on to Senator Jerry Grafstein's bill that would explicitly add suicide bombings to the Criminal Code definition of terrorism.

Recently, the current prime minister, Stephen Harper, told a supporter of the bill that his government also backs the bill, but with minor modifications.

Reuben Bromstein, president of Canadians Against Suicide Bombing, said he met Harper at a function recently and the prime minister told him the government "would support the bill with amendments."

Last week, the amended Bill S-205 passed unanimously through the Senate's constitutional and legal affairs committee after Tory senators added the amendments. It now awaits third reading in the upper chamber. Grafstein said he expects the bill to easily pass third reading and be referred to the House, where MP Bob Rae will take on his role of advocating for it.

Jerry Grafstein

"I'm delighted" by passage of the bill, Grafstein said. "This is a gigantic step forward."

Grafstein said the proposed amendments "in no way hamper or diminish what we are doing."

One of the amendments would specify that suicide bombings are a terrorist act only if done for terrorist purposes. That would exclude an individual act of murder if not done to pursue a political agenda, Grafstein said.

The other amendment would see the bill come into force when proclaimed by cabinet, as opposed to when it receives royal assent. Grafstein said that this will allow the government to enact the bill as part of a public education campaign.

Grafstein first introduced the bill in 2005, and it received third reading in May 2008. It proceeded to the House of Commons, where it died on the order paper when the chamber was prorogued. Grafstein was forced to reintroduce the bill in the Senate.

Stephen Harper

With the Tories and Liberals now on board, Grafstein hopes to convince the New Democrats and the Bloc Québécois to lend their support to the bill as well.

"I'm looking for all-party support," he said.

The bill, once passed, would be a made-in-Canada solution to an act that is plaguing many societies. "We're trying to say this weapon of choice is not acceptable, since it targets innocent people. The purpose of criminal law is to prevent against conduct that falls below community standards."

"This is not just a Jewish community issue," he continued, pointing to support he had received from other ethnic and religious communities.

Bromstein, a former judge of the Ontario Supreme Court, noted that a roster of prominent Canadians support the bill, including former prime ministers Joe Clark, Jean Chrétien, Paul Martin, Kim Campbell and John Turner.

Other supporters include Al-Hassani Haithem, representative of the Canadian-Iraqi Coordination Committee; former NDP leader Ed Broadbent; Tarek Fatah, founder of the Muslim Canadian Congress, and former Ontario premier David Peterson.

In testimony at the Senate, the RCMP and the Canadian Council of Criminal Defence Lawyers also supported the proposed legislation.

Thoughts on a Cairo moment

From the editor's desk...

The photo inset into this column has been around for many years. It made a reappearance recently, speeding through countless Internet connections in advance of the visit last month by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu with U.S. President Barack Obama in Washington.

The message intended by the mapmaker is quite unsubtle, as is the message intended by the people who sent it: to point out the stark contrast between the extent of the territory of the only sovereign Jewish state on Earth with the territory of the states that surround it in the rather overwhelmingly Muslim milieu of the Middle East.

The map therefore is quite useful and instructive for its own sake, because there are so many people who are simply unaware of Israel's geographic size in relation to the size of its neighbours. In light of the obsession with the Jewish state in so many parts of the world and the frequent distortion of the news about Israel in those same parts of the world, this number is likely very large.

The heading on the map, "End the unjust Jewish occupation of Arab land," is intended to be sarcastic precisely because of the gross asymmetry between the Jewish and Muslim territory in the Middle East.

The heading does indeed score a bull's-eye in accurately framing the dimension of the geo-political situation of that region of the world.

But sarcasm is a poor weapon for Israel's advocates, even if emotionally gratifying.

Moreover, even as gratification, it is a short-lived reward because the heading is inaccurate: the non-Jewish countries in the region – that is, all of them except Israel – are indeed Muslim, but not all Arab.

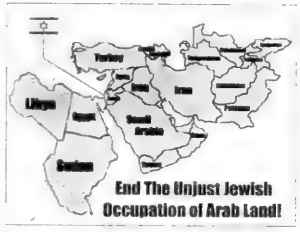
Israel's advocates must always be accurate in their advocacy. The facts of Israel's case are the facts of history.

Far worse, however, is the fact that the sarcasm is irrelevant to the main argument of the anti-Israel advocates. The Arab land that they say Israel occupies is the land that belonged to the Palestinians. By Arab land, some people mean the West Bank; others mean all of Mandatory Palestine (that is, the Israel of today).

Israel's advocates must always be pertinent in their advocacy. The relevance of Israel's case is the relevance of truth over falsehood.

It is therefore, with these Israel- advocacy rules in mind – accuracy and relevance – that U.S. President Barack Obama's historic speech in Cairo last week must be measured.

To be sure, the content of Obama's speech ranged more widely than Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. In, by now, trademark eloquence he outlined broad principles on seven discrete issues, only one of which dealt specifically with the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. But it was his remarks on this issue more than the others that undoubtedly held the Muslim world's attention most closely.



There is no denying that Obama earnestly and fervently wishes to bring about a permanent peace between Israelis and Palestinians. The thrust of his remarks was to demonstrate friendship to the Muslim world and sympathy for the plight of the Palestinians, while insisting that "Israel's legitimacy" be recognized by the Arab states and by all factions of Palestinians, including Hamas.

He has made it clear time and again that he considers Israel an ally. Indeed he affirmed at the very outset that America's bond with Israel "is unbreakable."

But the president's grasp of the justice of Israel's case appears dangerously lacking in the relevant facts of history, ancient and modern.

"The aspiration for a Jewish homeland is rooted in a tragic history that cannot be denied. Around the world the Jewish people were persecuted for centuries and anti-Semitism in Europe culminated in an unprecedented Holocaust."

In his speech, Obama anchored the Jews' claim to sovereign statehood in the shallow waters of anti-Semitism. By referencing Europe and the Holocaust, he vindicated the non-Holocaust denial aspect of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's argument that Muslims should not pay the price for Christian misbehaviour and Christian guilt.

Unfortunately, the president failed to anchor the Jewish claim to rightful existence in the Land of Israel in the deep seas of Jewish and world history.

As Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler has said, the Jewish people are aboriginal to the land that is the subject of the dispute with the Palestinians.

It was the Romans who adopted the name Palestina after they conquered the land and exiled the Jews. They obliterated the name Judea from the map. They could not, however, obliterate Judea from the hearts of the Jews who carried the name and the hope of return in every place and in every generation of their dispersion.

It would have been good if the president had explained on this basis to his Muslim audience the Jewish claim to rightful sovereignty in the State of Israel.

Ottawa pledges $1M for anti-Semitism task force

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

The Canadian government, in partnership with B'nai Brith Canada, will invest nearly $1 million on a national task force to combat anti-Semitism, Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney said last week.

Jason Kenney

The June 1 announcement was made at the Sutton Place Hotel at a conference titled "The St. Louis Era: Looking Back, Moving Forward."

The task force, which will promote further Holocaust education and research over the course of three years, was announced on the 70th anniversary of the voyage of the St. Louis, a German ocean liner carrying Jewish refugees that was turned away from the U.S. and Canadian coasts in June 1939.

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president, spoke of the verbal and physical attacks perpetrated against Jewish and pro-Zionist students at university campuses across Canada over the past year.

It seems unthinkable, he mused, that in this day and age, "Canadian universities would be the hotbed of anti-Semitism, disguised as anti-Zionism."

Dimant went on to praise Canada's boycott of the United Nations recent followup to its 2001 anti-racism conference, as well as Kenney's role as a supporter of the Jewish community.

"Your government has been a trailblazer… [and] we are proud to call Canada a friend and ally," Dimant said.

Kenney made reference to the book One Is Too Many, co-authored by Irving Abella and Harold Troper, which states that Canada accepted fewer Jewish immigrants during the period of 1933 to 1948 than any other western country. The book indicts the Mackenzie King government – and specifically its head of immigration, Frederick Charles Blair – for actively limiting the number of refugees attempting to immigrate to Canada. The book's title refers to a quote from an unnamed immigration officer who was asked how many Jews would be allowed into Canada after the war.

Kenney spoke of the St. Louis as "a symbol of anti-Semitism" that acts as a reminder of Canada's past to future generations in the hope that such an event won't happen again.

"Conferences like this are essential," Kenney said. "This must be the learning of [our] entire society… gatherings such as this demonstrate that there is a way to stamp out [anti-Semitism]."

In his speech, Kenney also mentioned his visit to the Yad Vashem Holocaust History Museum in Israel last month, and he drew comparisons between the tragedy of the Holocaust and present-day genocide in places such as Rwanda.

Kenney also noted that he would be visiting Oslo and Prague next month, the former being where Israelis and Palestinians negotiated peace accords in 1993, and the latter being near the former Terezin concentration camp, which held more than 55,000 Jews at the height of World War II.

B'nai Brith president Joe Bogoroch, presented Kenney with a commemorative plaque, which Bogoroch hoped would "honour the memory of [Holocaust] victims and ensure their legacy lives on through the ages."

"The exclusion of the St. Louis has to be seen as the first stage on the road to the Holocaust," said Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler, who spoke following Kenney. "It is the responsibility of the government to protect those who cannot be protected."

Cotler said the St. Louis incident was made possible because of the "de-legitimization" of the Jewish people.

Panel explores need to fight terrorism

There is nothing Israel wants more than to live in peace with its neighbours, including the Palestinians, said Rabbi Marvin Hier.

Rabbi Hier, dean and founder of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles, was one of the speakers at the fifth annual Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Spirit of Hope Benefit at Roy Thomson Hall on May 31.

Although his speech was infused with a sense of hope, Rabbi Hier warned the audience of about 2,000 against the threat of a nuclear-armed Iran, a danger not just to Israel but to the entire world. He compared the delayed response of the Allied forces to the Holocaust during World War II to the current lack of response to Iran's nuclear ambitions, and speculated on the consequences this could have for Israel's existence.

"There is no doubt on which side the western allies would come down if Iran ever attacked Israel," he said. "But by that time, despite all good intentions, it just might be again too late to save the Jews."

Earlier in the program, Prime Minister Stephen Harper was honoured with the Simon Wiesenthal International Leadership Award for his work in the field of justice and human rights, including the fight against anti-Semitism.

"Anti-Semitism is a threat to us all," Harper said in accepting the award from real estate mogul Philip Reichmann. Harper spoke of Canada's unwavering support for Israel, reflected in its withdrawal from Durban II, the review conference in April to follow up on the 2001 anti-racism conference held in Durban, South Africa. Harper described Durban II as a "hate-fest masquerading as a conference against racism."

The event wrapped up with a panel hosted by journalist Linda Frum, who interviewed former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton, former U.S. secretary of homeland security Michael Chertoff and former Australian prime minister John W. Howard about national security in the United States.

On the issue of border security, Frum asked how much current airport security measures actually accomplish.

Chertoff responded that "there is no one measure that will absolutely guarantee defence against terrorist attacks."

The panel agreed, however, that we are still not doing enough to protect our borders from terrorism. Although there have been many complaints from passengers since 9-11 about invasion of privacy at customs and security posts, Chertoff said that this view doesn't take into consideration the full scope of the problem. He stressed that by lowering our security measures, we would be "encouraging vulnerability" to terrorist attacks and that such measures should be supported by the American public to help ensure its safety.

Considering the question from another perspective, Frum asked the panellists about media criticism of the George W. Bush administration's policies, such as the use of waterboarding as an interrogation method and the holding of suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay.

Howard said he felt much of the criticism has been unfounded, especially toward the former U.S. president's handling of the 9-11 attacks.

"It is important to focus on the U.S. mindset back in 2001," he said. "Methods were used to protect a country from another attack.

"He did his job," Howard continued. "He protected his country. That should be the verdict regarding what is right."

In looking at the issue of post-9/11 world diplomacy, Frum asked about the possible impact of President Barack Obama's upcoming June 4 speech in Cairo reaching out to the Muslim world.

Howard said he supports the president's decision to address the Muslim world, adding, "I encourage anything that helps promote moderate Islam."

As Rabbi Hier had done earlier, Bolton responded by again referring to the danger posed by Iran. Given the opportunity, he said, he would tell the president to support an Israeli strike against Iran, since the alternative would be that the world would have to contend with a dangerous nuclear nation.

"Not every problem can be solved by diplomacy," he said.

U.S. can break political impasse, Israeli col. says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The current political impasse between Israel and the mainstream Palestinian leadership won't be broken unless the United States intervenes and presents its own peace proposals, a retired Israeli army colonel said last week.

Shaul Arieli

"I don't believe the gaps can be breached unless the United States becomes involved," Shaul Arieli, a former commander of the Israel Defence Forces' Northern Brigade in the Gaza Strip, told a Temple Sinai forum sponsored by Canadian Friends of Peace Now.

Arieli said that U.S. proposals should resemble the Arab League plan, which was first presented in 2002 and then resubmitted two years ago.

Under the Arab plan, Israel would pull out of territories captured in the Six Day War in exchange for recognition from, and full normalization with, Arab League members.

As part of the plan, the Palestinian refugee problem would be resolved by mutual consent.

Arieli is a member of Israel's Council for Peace and Security, a non-partisan group that considers peace a necessary component of Israel's national security.

In a critique of Israel's present government, led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Arieli suggested that it prefers the status quo to settling the long-running dispute with the Palestinians through a two-state solution.

Nor is Netanyahu particularly interested in coming to terms with Syria, he added. "Israel is in no hurry to negotiate with Syria."

According to Arieli, the gaps that separate Netanyahu and Mahmoud Abbas, the president of the Palestinian Authority, are greater than those that existed between Netanyahu's predecessor, Ehud Olmert, and his Palestinian counterpart.

Charging that Netanyahu is exploiting the threat posed by Iran's budding nuclear program to keep the West Bank in Israeli hands, Arieli also noted that he is using the Fatah-Hamas split to claim that Israel has no Palestinian negotiating partner.

In outlining the parameters of a final status peace agreement, Arieli cited several points.

- Israel should withdraw to its pre-1967 borders and a demilitarized Palestinian state should be established.
- There should be territorial swaps on a one-to-one ratio.
- Jerusalem should be divided and serve as the capital of both states.
- Palestinian refugees should be resettled in the new Palestinian state.
- The Palestinians should agree to a complete cessation of terrorism and violence.

In a survey of Israeli settlement activity in the West Bank, Arieli said that 475,000 Israelis live there at present. The figure includes eastern Jerusalem, he noted.

Arieli said that 70 per cent of Jewish settlers live on one per cent of the land in the West Bank.

Israel's separation barrier, as envisioned by former prime minister Ariel Sharon, was to have cut into 17 per cent of the West Bank, he said. But due to U.S. and international pressure, and Israeli Supreme Court rulings, Sharon changed the route of the fence to include only five per cent of the West Bank.

Olmert increased the proportion to eight per cent, he added.

Arieli believes that Israel will eventually retain 3.5 per cent of the West Bank, with 77 per cent of the settlers, in an accord with the Palestinians.

Advisory committee launched

Compiled by CJN Staff

An advisory committee formed by the Canadian government last month will develop monuments, exhibits and other educational material to recognize the history of the Jewish community in Canada.

The Jewish-Canadian advisory committee will be part of the Community Historical Recognition Program – a grants and contributions program for community-based commemorative projects related to past immigration and wartime restrictions applied in Canada.

The committee, which includes Toni Silberman as chair, Franklin Bialystok and David Demian, will have access to $2.5 million to develop projects that honour the Canadian-Jewish community.

"This government believes it is important for all Canadians to understand our history, including those unfortunate events that are inconsistent with the values of Canadians today," said Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney.

"These important projects enable the communities affected to undertake meaningful commemorative and educational activities to ensure that their experiences are shared with others."

A rare moment

U.S.President Barack Obama deserves credit for trying to change the paradigm of foreign relations with the Muslim world. "I have come here to seek a new beginning," he told an audience at Al-Azhar University in Cairo last week, intending his words to reach far wider and far deeper into the Muslim psyche.

The very fact that he travelled to Egypt to make his points was noteworthy. One can even add, without fawning, that it was a rare moment in modern diplomacy.

There is no denying that the entire world would benefit were the American-Muslim (perhaps more accurately, Arab) paradigm to shift toward greater mutual understanding and respect. Whether it does will be seen only in the months and years to come.

But what will be required to cause leaders in the Muslim (read Arab) world to embrace the idea of a shift will become more readily apparent in the days and weeks to come.

what the leaders of the Arab world will require subordinating the needs of the Jewish state to achieve that new beginning. Parsing the president's Al-Azhar speech to find clues yields only partial comfort, despite the firm declaration that the "American bond with Israel is unbreakable."

Among the many principles that Obama articulated was this attractive statement: "But if we see the conflict only from one side or the other, then we will be blind to the truth." The truth that he was referring to in this specific case was the need for two states "where Israelis and Palestinians each live in peace and security."

Most Israelis are reconciled to, and support, a two-state solution. The Oslo process of 1993 proved that. The formation of the Kadima party to continue with Oslo-envisioned policies proved that further. The earnest, but failed, efforts by former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert to reach an agreement with the Palestinians proves this beyond doubt.

But are Palestinians in favour of two states? The war of terror this decade, the violence unleashed from Gaza after Israel unilaterally withdrew from there and the refusal by current "moderate" leaders to say that Israel can be the state for the Jews suggest they are not.

An historic day

Last week, 65 years ago on June 6, some 155,000 Allied forces from Canada, the United States and Great Britain stormed the beaches of Normandy and attested to a truth that changed the course of modern history: the brutal, racist, murderous fascism of the Nazis and the Axis powers had to be defeated at all costs. There was then only one side from which to see the conflict. Not all sides in a conflict, it must be remembered, carry equal moral weight. There does come a point, it must be emphasized, when one side must take a stand. Ignoring that truth can also make us blind. We owe that recognition and much, much more to the soldiers of D-Day.

25 years ago in The CJN

Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir proposed that troops from the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) be deployed as a buffer between Israeli and Syrian forces in the Bekaa Valley of eastern Lebanon, despite saying he had no great expectations about the UN's role in the Middle East.

Obama's Cairo speech (1)

Let us clearly understand the significance of Barack Obama's speech in Cairo last week on the subject of Jewish settlements in the West Bank – the U.S. president had to travel to Egypt (Mitzrayim) to utter the same words as Pharoah: "No more Jewish children!"

Obama's Cairo speech (2)

U.S. President Barack Obama chose the failed route of "two states for two Peoples" in his Cairo speech last week, which can only bring the same results as past attempts. No state can exist by declaration only. It needs an economy, a functioning government and stability. None of that exists for the Palestinians in the disputed territories. Numerous past declarations and photo-ops did not create a functioning entity.

JEWISH NEIGHBOURHOOD WATCH
OKAY PEOPLE - KEEP YOUR EYE OUT FOR BURGLARY, VIOLENCE...
WHAT ABOUT ASSIMILATION?
INTER MARRIAGE?
BREAKING SHABBAT?

Also, Obama's insistence that settlements are the main obstacle to peace, while not saying a word about Palestinian terror and hate – the main reason for the current stalemate – is puzzling, to say the least.

Since 1993 and the signing of the Oslo accords, no progress toward peace has been made on the Palestinian side. Israel gave the Palestinians arms and control over most of the disputed territories and received terror in return, the clear message being the war will intensify until Israel is eliminated.

Is Obama unaware of recent history? Are settlements the main obstacle? UN Security Council Resolution 242, which stipulates Israel's "right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries," has been all but forgotten.

Sadly, Obama is taking the wrong path and not tackling the real issues in the Middle East.

Jewish sovereignty over Jerusalem

The nations of the world are obsessed that Israel relinquish its sovereignty over all of Jerusalem ("Partition of Jerusalem guarantees chaos," CJN Toronto, May 28). Have they not an iota of decency? I can't think of a more fundamental ethic than recognizing and appreciating the good someone does to you (Hakarat Hatov) and, by extension, thanking the Creator for His beneficence.

The Hebrew Bible, in contrast to the New Testament and Qur'an, is unique in stressing this ethic. Christians and Muslims – whose religions, particularly Islam, are indebted to the mother religion, Judaism – begrudge Jews sovereignty over Jerusalem when they have their holy cities of Rome and Mecca. Just as the more than 100 countries whose official or dominant religions are Christianity or Islam are irrationally preoccupied with the borders of the tiny Jewish state.

WWII documentaries focus on Canadians

June 6 marked the 65th anniversary of D-Day – the greatest Allied battle of World War II.

Three important documentaries tell of the sacrifice and heroism of Canadians on D-Day. The War Amps Military Heritage Series D-Day: The Story of the Canadian Assault Troops, tells of the achievements of Canadians who got farther inland on D-Day than any of the other forces in Normandy; Operation Charnwood: The Canadian Battle for Caen details the Canadian advance inland following the D-Day invasion; and Take No Prisoners: The Nazi SS in Normandy is a chilling account of the execution of more than 130 Canadian soldiers by the Nazi SS following the Normandy invasion.

To commemorate this anniversary, members of War Amps Operation Legacy have donated these documentaries to libraries across Canada. They are also available at a cost-recovery price from the War Amps. For more information, visit www.waramps.ca.

Seeking Auschwitz survivors

A film crew that is making a documentary to be broadcast next year by Radio Canada is seeking former female forced labourers who worked in the Auschwitz Union Metallindustrie munitions factory. The women were part of the Union kommando in December 1944.

On Dec. 12, 1944, they created a booklet in the shape of a heart for the 20th birthday of their workmate, Fania Landau. They each signed the booklet and wrote birthday messages to her. At the time, the women would have been known by the following first names or nicknames: Berta; Cesia; Eva; Fela; Giza (or Gizela); Gûsia (or Guta); Hanka; Halinka; Hélène; Irena; Mala; Mira; Mina; Rachela; Ruth; and Tania (or Tonia).

Further information about these women and our film can be found at http://heart-of-auschwitz.blogspot.com or by calling Ad Hoc Films at 514-529-2198, or e-mailing adhocfilms@gmail.com.

Perspectives

Obama's speech marks a strategic revolution for Israel

By ALUF BENN

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

U.S. President Barack Obama is a rock star. He has total confidence in his powers of persuasion – if he can just have access to a platform, two teleprompters and airtime. Let him speak to the audience, any audience, and he'll sell them a new, friendly, considerate America. Obama's meteoric rise to the presidency and his massive popularity just go to show that his self-confidence is well founded.

Israel has had just one leader who rose to power and governed by virtue of his oratory, and that was prime minister Menachem Begin. But Obama is no Begin, who moved the masses with his fiery tone and impassioned rhetoric: the current American president wins his audience over with the inner calm that he projects, and with his ability to sound candid and spontaneous, even when reading a speech that has undergone dozens of drafts, and in which every sentence has been carefully weighed – and then weighed again.

Last week, Obama took the stage at Cairo University to deliver his most important speech since taking office. Obama met the oratorical challenge he set for himself: he did not sound insincere or hypocritical when paying homage to Muslim culture and its achievements, nor did he sound apologetic or self-righteous when speaking about the disputes of the past and the need to turn over a new leaf. Obama ascribed the mistakes of his predecessor, George Bush, to the trauma of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Less than eight years after Sept. 11, the Oval Office is now occupied by a president who was raised and schooled in a Muslim country, and who is trying to convince Muslims and Arabs that the United States is not the enemy, but rather a legitimate partner to their interests and aspirations. A president who came to Cairo to promise that from now on, America will treat Islam nicely and that Bush's "crusade" – and attempt to dictate to the Arabs how to behave and how to govern – has come to an end.

For Israel, Obama's "Cairo speech" marks nothing less than a strategic revolution. During the Bush era, Israel was America's friendliest partner in the war on terror, and enjoyed military freedom of operation against the Palestinians, Hezbollah and Syria, for which it in return withdrew from the Gaza settlements. With Obama, Israel has to undergo a re-education, and will have to once again pass a test of its dedication to U.S. interests in the Middle East.

Until yesterday, Obama discussed the Israeli-Arab conflict in terms of interests, and refrained from speaking about values and ethics. But in Cairo, he used the vocabulary and narrative of the American liberal left, whence he came. He spoke unwaveringly about "the occupation" and about the "Palestinians aspiration for dignity, opportunity, and a state of their own," and promised that the United States would not turn its back on the Palestinians. He called on Hamas to show responsibility and to recognize Israel's right to exist; he did not call it a terror organization, but a movement that enjoys some popular support.

In addressing the Palestinians, Obama urged that they wage their war without violence, and he compared it to the struggle of black slaves in America to be freed from white domination, to the struggle of the blacks in South Africa, and to the struggles of other nations in South Asia and eastern Europe.

This is not an easy comparison for Israeli ears: in Obama's view, the Palestinians are waging a just struggle for national liberation, which reminds him of past efforts to break free of colonialism and Soviet tyranny. In the same breath, he called upon the Arab world to acknowledge the history of Jewish persecution and the Holocaust, and to understand that Arab anti-Semitism only exacerbates the Israelis' trauma, just as Israel's behaviour exacerbates the Palestinian trauma of expulsion.

Obama knows what the solution is: the establishment of a Palestinian state alongside Israel. He is not prepared to hear any other ideas. He demands that Israel stop expanding the settlements: "The United States does not accept the legitimacy of continued Israeli settlements," he said, adding that this phenomenon violates previous agreements and undermines peace efforts.

Having proclaimed this loud and clear, there is no way that Obama can still agree to "natural growth" and other tricks designed to increase construction in the settlements. Now his credibility is on the line. It's his word against Israel's resolve to keep building. And this means that if Obama does exhibit the patience with which he promised to deal with the conflict, Israel will be facing a political crisis and a serious internal rift.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is on the wrong side of Obama's speech, with his refusal to endorse a Palestinian state and his insistence on "natural growth" in the settlements. He might have been able to soften the blow a bit had he formed a coalition with Tzipi Livni on the basis of the two-state solution. Or if, during his White House visit, he had announced that he was embracing the "road map" peace plan. But that's of no importance now.

Before long, Netanyahu will have to deliver a speech in response to Obama, and to declare a historic change in his ideology and policy. Until then, he'll go on hoping for a miracle that will wipe the "Cairo speech" off the agenda and make it disappear into the swirling sands of Middle East diplomacy.

The second major source of tension that we need to discuss is the situation between Israelis, Palestinians and the Arab world.

America's strong bonds with Israel are well-known. This bond is unbreakable. It is based upon cultural and historical ties, and the recognition that the aspiration for a Jewish homeland is rooted in a tragic history that cannot be denied.

Around the world, the Jewish people were persecuted for centuries, and anti-Semitism in Europe culminated in an unprecedented Holocaust. Tomorrow, I will visit Buchenwald, which was part of a network of camps where Jews were enslaved, tortured, shot and gassed to death by the Third Reich. Six million Jews were killed – more than the entire Jewish population of Israel today. Denying that fact is baseless, ignorant and hateful. Threatening Israel with destruction – or repeating vile stereotypes about Jews – is deeply wrong, and only serves to evoke in the minds of Israelis this most painful of memories while preventing the peace that the people of this region deserve.

On the other hand, it is also undeniable that the Palestinian people – Muslims and Christians – have suffered in pursuit of a homeland. For more than 60 years, they have endured the pain of dislocation. Many wait in refugee camps in the West Bank, Gaza, and neighbouring lands for a life of peace and security that they have never been able to lead. They endure the daily humiliations – large and small – that come with occupation. So let there be no doubt: the situation for the Palestinian people is intolerable. America will not turn our backs on the legitimate Palestinian aspiration for dignity, opportunity, and a state of their own.

For decades, there has been a stalemate: two peoples with legitimate aspirations, each with a painful history that makes compromise elusive. It is easy to point fingers – for Palestinians to point to the displacement brought by Israel's founding, and for Israelis to point to the constant hostility and attacks throughout its history from within its borders as well as beyond. But if we see this conflict only from one side or the other, then we will be blind to the truth: the only resolution is for the aspirations of both sides to be met through two states, where Israelis and Palestinians each live in peace and security.

That is in Israel's interest, Palestine's interest, America's interest, and the world's interest. That is why I intend to personally pursue this outcome with all the patience that the task requires. The obligations that the parties have agreed to under the "road map" [peace plan] are clear. For peace to come, it is time for them – and all of us – to live up to our responsibilities.

Palestinians must abandon violence. Resistance through violence and killing is wrong and does not succeed. For centuries, black people in America suffered the lash of the whip as slaves and the humiliation of segregation. But it was not violence that won full and equal rights. It was a peaceful and determined insistence upon the ideals at the centre of America's founding. This same story can be told by people from South Africa to South Asia; from eastern Europe to Indonesia. It's a story with a simple truth: that violence is a dead end. It is a sign of neither courage nor power to shoot rockets at sleeping children, or to blow up old women on a bus. That is not how moral authority is claimed; that is how it is surrendered.

Now is the time for Palestinians to focus on what they can build. The Palestinian Authority must develop its capacity to govern, with institutions that serve the needs of its people. Hamas does have support among some Palestinians, but they also have responsibilities. To play a role in fulfilling Palestinian aspirations, and to unify the Palestinian people, Hamas must put an end to violence, recognize past agreements and recognize Israel's right to exist.

At the same time, Israelis must acknowledge that just as Israel's right to exist cannot be denied, neither can Palestine's. The United States does not accept the legitimacy of continued Israeli settlements. This construction violates previous agreements and undermines efforts to achieve peace. It is time for these settlements to stop.

Israel must also live up to its obligations to ensure that Palestinians can live, and work, and develop their society. And just as it devastates Palestinian families, the continuing humanitarian crisis in Gaza does not serve Israel's security; neither does the continuing lack of opportunity in the West Bank. Progress in the daily lives of the Palestinian people must be part of a road to peace, and Israel must take concrete steps to enable such progress.

Finally, the Arab states must recognize that the Arab Peace Initiative was an important beginning, but not the end of their responsibilities. The Arab-Israeli conflict should no longer be used to distract the people of Arab nations from other problems. Instead, it must be a cause for action to help the Palestinian people develop the institutions that will sustain their state; to recognize Israel's legitimacy; and to choose progress over a self-defeating focus on the past.

America will align our policies with those who pursue peace, and say in public what we say in private to Israelis and Palestinians and Arabs. We cannot impose peace. But privately, many Muslims recognize that Israel will not go away. Likewise, many Israelis recognize the need for a Palestinian state. It is time for us to act on what everyone knows to be true.

Too many tears have flowed. Too much blood has been shed. All of us have a responsibility to work for the day when the mothers of Israelis and Palestinians can see their children grow up without fear; when the Holy Land of three great faiths is the place of peace that God intended it to be; when Jerusalem is a secure and lasting home for Jews and Christians and Muslims, and a place for all of the children of Abraham to mingle peacefully together as in the story of Isra, when Moses, Jesus and Mohammed (peace be upon them) joined in prayer.

Opinions

From Moriah to Masada

The biblical Abraham took his son Isaac to Mount Moriah on a journey with a happy ending. But some Jewish parents nowadays take their children to the fortress of Masada, which tells a tragic story.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Rabbis who perform bar and bat mitzvah ceremonies there and in other tourist spots will be very busy over the summer. One I know of gets so many requests that he has to outsource some.

He has his own Torah scroll, but subcontractors must find their own, which can be borrowed for a fee. The officiating rabbi then meets with the family to make sure that the ceremony is according to its specification. For this is about customer service. The pay is handsome, but after deductions for rental and commission to the main contractor, there isn't that much left.

Though I've never officiated at such an event – and I pray I never will – I've attended a few. Those I witnessed reflected things I've always been opposed to:

- There's no education required: the child learns by rote the blessings and a few verses of Hebrew text. As the ceremonies are usually held on Mondays and Thursdays, there's no Haftorah.
- There's a callous disregard for prayer for the sake of brevity. All that the people seem to want is a beautiful performance, however poor in content, allowing plenty of time for the meal.
- They feature a distorted expression of Zionism, improbably but piously suggesting that it's love for the Land of Israel that brought the family to the place where some Jews chose martyrdom almost two millennia ago.

When I was a congregational rabbi, I pleaded with families to celebrate bar and bat mitzvahs in and with the congregation, not far away from home. When I wrote about it, some travel agents protested that I interfered with their business. I comforted them with the assurance that people usually ignore what I write.

In any case, many of those who go to Masada are unaffiliated. They try to avoid synagogues, rabbis and Jewish education. A bar or bat mitzvah in Israel is their alibi.

Spending time in Israel is one of the most important ways that we can bind our children to the faith, People and Land of Israel. But not when they're 12 or 13! You've got to be older to benefit.

The bar and bat mitzvah symbolism at Masada is frightening. Moriah tells us that Isaac survived despite his father's readiness to sacrifice him. Masada is about unwarranted martyrdom. We must celebrate our children where there's life – in shul, however modest – not in a burial place, however trendy.

Lessons learned in Istanbul

I recently travelled to Istanbul for a trip I have wanted to make for many years. The first author to inspire me to visit the city was Shai Agnon. When I read his Bilvav Yamim (In the Heart of the Seas) in my youth, I was taken by this novella about a group of religious pilgrims on their journey of aliyah. Their last taste of land and of the Diaspora was Constantinople (Istanbul), and Agnon paints a humorous picture of the place – fantastic, whimsical, and as upside-down as the Diaspora was for these proto-Zionists. Since then, Istanbul kept appearing in books I was reading, fiction and non-fiction.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

After a while, I felt the need to explore the city and its rich history first hand. I wasn't disappointed, and I was greatly assisted by reading in situ authors such as Orhan Pamuk, winner of the Nobel Prize in literature in 2006, and Irfan Orga.

Strangely, except for a visit to the Jewish museum and to a kosher butcher, I didn't have contact with the Jewish community, due to an innocent failure in logistics, but my visit had other purposes.

What overwhelmed me were the remnants of past civilizations that, in their time, were as advanced in their engineering and as sophisticated in their esthetics as we can imagine. The huge fifth-century water cistern of Justinian, with its perfect geometry and state-of-the-art construction techniques, make our Blackberries pale in comparison. The storytelling beauty of the mosaic palace floor compares favourably with any art produced since. In fact, the upside-down Medusa in the cistern is pre-Picasso Picasso!

Yes, we can compare our scientific progress and our esthetic development to that of past cultures, but the one area in which we have not progressed at all is in the domain of human values. The Byzantines, the Ottomans and even Mustafa Kemal Ataturk all adopted and adapted values that were originally taught at Sinai. (You didn't think I had forgotten my Jewish agenda?) They refracted them through the various prisms of Christianity, Islam and the modern nation state, and yet there has been no progress at all in this life-critical realm.

Indeed, some would argue that we have regressed in all realms because of the amorality of human history (see Ronald Wright's brilliant essay A Short History of Progress, which was based on the 2004 CBC Massey Lectures). The technology of the 20th century made it the bloodiest yet. The start of the 21st gives us little hope.

While we can't neglect our constant scientific searching and the poetry that makes life worthwhile, education must take a radical turn to give human values their proper curricular due. If that is true in the big wide world, how much more demanding is it in the tiny sliver that we inhabit as the Jewish People.

During the recent festival of Shavuot, we celebrated the second cosmic moment of our history, the Revelation at Sinai, where we took on the responsibility to act as values-mentors to the world. But with all of the sophisticated educational techniques we have mastered, are we, in fact, teaching those values to our very own children? Can we identify them and reveal their beauty in the old books and their relevance to new dilemmas? Do we know how to transmit them so that they pass from generation to generation?

My voyage to Istanbul converged with some thinking I have been engaged in lately regarding the teaching of Jewish values as a primary curricular concern rather than a by-product of other Jewish teaching. It all seems rather obvious, and yet, it wouldn't shock me to find that most educational settings (especially schools) teach texts, language, and history as primary subjects with the hope that values will come through somehow. What often shocks parents is my assertion that the Jewish studies curriculum in a day school (if taught well) is more important than the general studies domain, since the former has the potential for teaching values, an area in which humanity has not progressed at all.

Perhaps that bit of Diaspora soil in Istanbul has hidden lessons that Agnon was all too aware of.

The future of Holocaust memory

Of the difficulty in writing about the Holocaust, Elie Wiesel once observed, "Whoever has not lived through the event can never know it. And whoever has lived through it can never fully reveal it."

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

And yet, beginning immediately after and continuing into the present, survivors of the genocide launched against the Jews of Europe plunge into the depths of memory, determined to leave a tangible record of the past for future generations. The written, oral and videotaped recollections retrieve not only a large, collective history but also personal, individual stories.

There is, however, a disturbing countertrend: the growing list of memoir hoaxes. These books, purporting to be autobiographies by Holocaust survivors, are in actuality falsified memories, put forth by people who are not what they claim to be. Whether the product of delusion or of cool calculation, more than 60 years after the end of World War II, such claims of victimization and survival threaten to blur the boundary between historical truth and fantasy. Left unchallenged, falsified memoirs can threaten the public perception of the credibility of Holocaust memoirs more generally.

Perhaps the most widely known case is that of Binjamin Wilkomirski, whose slender volume, Fragments: Memories of a Wartime Childhood, claimed to be the impressionistic but vivid memories of a very young Jewish child who survived several concentration camps after witnessing the murder of his father. First published in 1995, Fragments met with great acclaim, and garnered major literary awards. By 2000, the book was proven to be false, its author a Swiss, non-Jewish man raised by adoptive parents after his single mother relinquished him to an orphanage. In archival videotaped testimony, Wilkomirski appears convinced of the truth of his fabricated past. Some researchers conjecture that his invented memories are metaphors for his inner state, either by deliberate choice or delusion.

More recently, a memoir by Misha Defonseca, first released in 1997, was proven to be fraudulent. Published under the titles Misha: A Memoire of the Holocaust Years and Surviving with Wolves, the book relates the story of a young Belgian Jewish girl whose parents were deported to Auschwitz. Determined to be reunited with them, she walks across war-torn Europe, reaching as far as Ukraine and back again. Along the way, she is adopted by a family of wolves, nurtured by the mother wolf and accepted by the cubs as one of their own. In an interesting twist, before the book was exposed as a hoax, the author sued her U.S. publisher for not sufficiently publicizing the book and was awarded more than $22 million.

Several scholars of Holocaust studies noted the unlikeliness of either of these memoirs being authentic; some even warned the publisher prior to publication. And yet a large segment of the reading public seized upon these works, embracing them as moving and revealing records of a past that their authors, in actuality, had never experienced.

The falsification of Holocaust memory is different from Holocaust fiction – different, that is, from works that deliberately and openly employ the artistic licence, devices and resources of literature to reflect upon and represent the past. Holocaust literature can illuminate our understanding of the past and our relationship to it. False memoirs muddy the waters. And, as the war years recede further into the past, our culture will become more vulnerable to such hoaxes.

All the more reason, then, to read and to recommend memoirs by authors whose truth contract with readers and with the past is upheld. Memoirs by Holocaust survivors – such as the series published this month by Azrieli Foundation in partnership with York University's Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies – provide a counterweight to the more sensational, scandalous cases. The details of memory etch the catastrophe into the historical record. Just as importantly, they illuminate the richness of everyday life and Jewish culture before and after the war, and the resonances of the past in our own lives.

Taken together, the shards of individual memory work to reconstruct a sense of the past that, as Wiesel notes, of necessity remains incomplete, never fully knowable.

The Kirshner File

The Madoff fiasco

Novelist Elie Wiesel, broadcaster Larry King, film director Steven Spielberg, World Trade Center developer Larry Silverstein and Hall of Fame baseball pitcher Sandy Koufax all have something in common apart from being Jewish.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

They are among thousands of investors who lost tons of money in an amazingly elaborate Ponzi pyramid scheme hatched and administered by rogue New York financier Bernard Madoff, who was arrested last December after telling two senior employees, his sons Andrew and Mark, and FBI agents that he had defrauded individual investors and Jewish charities.

By all accounts, his company, Bernard L. Madoff Securities, swindled clients of $65 billion (US), a world record.

On March 12, in a federal courtroom in Manhattan, Madoff admitted his guilt for the first time in public and apologized to his victims. "I knew what I was doing was wrong, indeed criminal," he said. "As the years went by, I realized this day, and my arrest, would inevitably come."

Acknowledging that he had "deeply hurt" many people, he added, "I cannot adequately express how sorry I am for what I have done."

Madoff, 70, was charged with 11 counts of fraud, money laundering, perjury and theft, which carry maximum terms totalling 150 years. Shortly after he pleaded guilty, a federal appeals judge denied a request by his lawyer that he be released from the Metropolitan Correctional Center in Manhattan and allowed to return to his multimillion-dollar penthouse apartment.

Scheduled to be sentenced later this month, he will probably spend the rest of his days in prison.

The fate he so richly deserves may mollify his victims to some degree. Yet the vast majority are not ever likely to recover their funds. Irving Picard, a court-appointed trustee, has so far identified about $1 billion in assets so that a financial settlement can be reached. Yet there may be more assets out there. Newly filed court documents show that Madoff and his wife, Ruth, have a personal net worth of $823 million, which includes real estate in New York, Florida and France, jewelry, artwork, furniture, automobiles and a yacht.

In the meantime, Madoff's victims stew in anger and disbelief. Wiesel, who lost his life savings, told the New York Times, "This man knew what he was doing. I would simply call him thief, scoundrel, criminal. Psychopath – it's too nice a word for him."

Wiesel's disclaimer notwithstanding, Madoff shares most of the traits typically associated with a psychopath. A charlatan of epic proportions, he is a liar and manipulator, and possesses an ability to deceive and behave callously.

Who could have known?

Known as a charismatic, amiable man who supposedly treated his employees like family, Madoff exuded a mesmerizing effect.

"What is lost amid the fury of some of those who handed their money over to him is that theirs was a voluntary – nay, eager – association," writes novelist Daphne Merkin, whose brother, Ezra, a prominent financier and philanthropist, steered more than $2 billion of his clients' money into Madoff's fund. "No one was holding a gun to anyone's head, saying sign up with Mr. Madoff or else. Far from it: people scrambled to find a home within his financial orbit, auditioning for the role of Madoff client… nudging connections to put in a good word, calling in favours to get in on a piece of the Madoff action."

In her view, Madoff fooled investors by conveying "a sense of mishpachah" and humanizing the cold, heartless, anonymous world of investment by giving it an avuncular face.

As she puts it, "He was the quintessential nice guy… He looked trustworthy."

In his courtroom appearance, Madoff claimed that he tried to "extricate" himself and his clients from disaster, but found it "impossible" to devise a successful exit strategy.

It may be true.

Madoff had an abiding and compelling interest in saving himself and staving off disgrace and ignominy. But like all Ponzi schemes, this one was also doomed to implode, since the American economy had shuddered into the gravest recession since the Great Depression.

Madoff, the former chair of Nasdaq, a major stock exchange, lured investors by pledging extraordinarily high returns.

For a while, he made good on his promise. But according to prosecutors, he directed his inexperienced and badly trained staff to generate false and fraudulent documents, told lies, generated phony records and funnelled hundreds of millions of dollars from bank to bank to foster an illusion of active trading.

Discredited financier Bernard Madoff heads into court in Manhattan.

The Madoff magic worked, thanks to laxness on the part of the Security and Exchange Commission – a federal government regulatory body – and of fund managers who ignored warning signs.

Aside from duping individuals such as Montreal-born New York developer and newspaper proprietor Mortimer Zuckerman and Quebec ski resort operator Phil Robinson, Madoff also cheated banks (including the Royal Bank of Canada), Yeshiva University, and Jewish charitable organizations from the American Jewish Congress to Hadassah-WIZO.

Several of these groups have been so grievously harmed that Mark Charendoff of the Jewish Funders Network has described the debacle as "an atomic bomb in Jewish philanthropy."

Madoff has cost Wiesel's foundation $15 million, Yeshiva University $110 million and the American Jewish Congress roughly $21 million of its $24 million endowment fund. "It's a serious blow," said its acting co-executive director, Marc Stern.

Hadassah was fleeced of a reported $90 million.

In Israel, the impact has been felt profoundly as well.

Yad Sarah, a volunteer organization created by the former mayor of Jerusalem, Uri Lupolianski, and admired for its assistance to sick, disabled and elderly Israelis, lost approximately $1.5 million.

Youth in Distress, which helps homeless and neglected Jewish and Arab youth, invested $850,000 with Madoff, all of which has disappeared. The American-Israel Cultural Foundation, which has supported musicians such as Daniel Barenboim and Itzhak Perlman, has been hit hard, too. At least two foundations, the Chais Family Foundation and the Yeshaya Horowitz Association, have been forced to close or freeze operations.

Letters and e-mail messages released by the United States Attorney's office for the southern district of New York attest to the fact that many of the victims were not just rich and famous but ordinary middle-class people who assumed that they were placing their hard-earned savings into a safe and conservative fund.

"I liken this situation to a domestic holocaust," wrote a New Jersey construction worker. "Mr. Madoff took my hopes, dreams and self-esteem," lamented a divorced elderly woman. "I am at my wits' end."

Sadly but inevitably, Madoff's machinations have played into the hands of anti-Semitic stereotypes and myths.

In a statement, the Anti-Defamation League said that his arrest had prompted an outpouring of derogatory comments on anti-Jewish websites.

Lest it be forgotten, there are rotten apples in every barrel. Many of the investors who took Madoff at his word and trusted him to safeguard their precious assets are Jewish. Madoff could not have cared less.

Leo Baeck launches new siddur

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

It's no fluke that Leo Baeck Day School administrators chose the morning of Erev Shavuot – the eve of the holiday that celebrates the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai – to launch its new siddur, according to Eric Petersiel.

The driving force behind the siddur's creation, Petersiel is principal of Leo Baeck's south campus, housed at Holy Blossom Temple. He will become head of school in September.

At the siddur launch, held at Holy Blossom May 28, Petersiel said, "We hope it will be the bridge that will lead students to a life of Jewish experience."

The attractive, hard-cover siddur is a slim, user-friendly volume that includes the Shacharit service, Kabbalat Shabbat, the core of the Minchah service, prayers said in the home, Zmirot, and accompanying commentary by Baruch Sienna, who edited the book.

A second volume for students in grades 1 through 4 is being planned to supplement the new one, which is for grades 5 to 8.

According to a news release, Leo Baeck is, to the best of anyone's knowledge there, the only school in Canada to create and produce its own siddur.

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, chair of the school's board of directors, said the siddur is "a watershed" for the school, and marks its coming of age.

When Leo Baeck was established some 36 years ago, he recalled, there were fewer than 40 students and teachers housed in cramped classrooms at Temple Emanu-El, where Rabbi Bielfeld is rabbi emeritus.

Today, the school has a total of more than 900 students and faculty on two campuses.

The siddur's text not only reflects rabbinic wisdom, but "invites young inquiring minds to ponder, and even challenge, the wisdom of the rabbis," Rabbi Bielfeld said.

He praised its "economy of words, and a language that speaks to the heart as well as to the intellect." As well, he spoke of the design of the siddur's pages, which "delight the eye with their imaginative drawings," done by students at the school.

The rabbi also noted the siddur's "embrace of rituals that were once abandoned and disregarded by some of our former generations of Reform Jews.

"And yet," he continued, "it is unapologetic in affirming the unique contribution of the Reform movement to the liturgy of our people."

The project, which Petersiel conceived of about six years ago, brought the school community closer together, said Brian Simon, president of Leo Baeck's board.

After being on hold for a few years, the siddur project was adopted by the school's Nachas Club, made up of grandparents of students. As well, the school's parents' association assisted in funding it, Simon said.

The objective, he added, "was to create a professional and high quality book that would serve as a symbol of the school's culture and character and that would meet our students' needs."

Students and teachers from both Leo Baeck campuses, school founders, supporters and alumni gathered for a song-filled siddur launch led by Grade 8 students at the school's Holy Blossom campus. Pictured, from left, are music teacher Randy Starr, supporter Leslie Dan, school alumna Hannah Davis reading Torah, and south campus principal Eric Petersiel. [Rebecca Ansel photo]

Holocaust Memoir Series set for June 15

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Nechama Tec was told Daniel Craig would play the role of wartime partisan Tuvia Bielsky in the movie Defiance, her initial reaction was to ask, "Daniel who?"

Nechama Tec

She was quite familiar with the Bielsky part of the equation, having based her book, Defiance, on his story and those of the Jews he saved during the Holocaust.

But Craig?

Tec, a sociologist by profession and a Holocaust survivor herself, was unfamiliar with Craig, who gained international acclaim as the latest James Bond. Nevertheless, she's "extremely happy" with the way the film turned out, including, no doubt, Craig's performance.

Tec, who is currently working on a book that will contrast Jewish and non-Jewish resistance to the Nazis in eastern Europe, will be in Toronto next week to address the Holocaust Survivor Memoir Series, a free event that will be held at the Winter Garden Theatre.

Sponsored by the Azrieli Foundation, the June 15 event will see the launch of eight new paperback memoirs of Holocaust survivors, published by the foundation. The survivors, their children or grandchildren will read from the books.

Defiance, which Tec completed in 1993, is a scholarly work and "rarely" does such a work become a popular movie. Not only does it tell the story of how Bielsky and his brothers saved Jews, it instructs the wider world in a reality that is all too often ignored – that Jews were not all passive victims of the Nazis, she said.

"There were lots of instances in communities where there was resistance."

Allied armies took years to defeat the Hitler war machine, so Jewish resistance "couldn't succeed, but if it occurred in any way, it was a miracle," she said.

The 1943 Warsaw Ghetto uprising might be the most well-known act of resistance, but there were other revolts in ghettoes, concentration camps, and the death camps such as Auschwitz, Treblinka and Sobibor.

Though there was no chance of defeating the Nazis, "there was a decision, a need to retain some of their human autonomy, their Jewish selfhood. They wanted to make a statement," she said.

Tec said she came to the Bielsky story almost by accident. She had been interviewing survivor Oswald Rufeisen for another book, In The Lion's Den. During the war, Rufeisen passed as a half-German, half-Polish member of the German gendarmerie, where he used his position to help Jews in trouble.

Eventually he had to flee – after helping 305 Jews escape a ghetto – and he eventually became a partisan under Bielsky. When Tec interviewed Bielsky to corroborate that story, she learned that while Rufeisen had saved 305 Jews, Bielsky had saved 1,200.

Fascinated by the Bielsky story, she interviewed him several times and after close to 10 years, she published Defiance. (Her books often take eight to 10 years to write, as she has several projects on the go at any one time.)

Tec is pleased the Azrieli Foundation is choosing to highlight the memoirs of Holocaust survivors. "It promotes and increases our knowledge of the history of that period," she said.

Naomi Azrieli, chair and executive director of the foundation, which is named for her father, developer David Azrieli, said that in recent years it has invested substantial sums and efforts to gather and publish the memoirs of Holocaust survivors.

Since 2005, when the foundation began soliciting manuscripts, it has gathered some 170 memoirs, ranging from 20 pages in length to more than 900 pages. They are accepted "as is." Some were written in Yiddish, some in Romanian, Hungarian and other languages.

Each year, the foundation publishes seven to 10 books. They're translated and edited "very lightly" to ensure the writer's "voice" is retained while ensuring the writing remains "clear and accessible," Azrieli said.

"They are more than a historical record," she said. "The memoirs are personal recollections. Sometimes they are not a perfect chronology [of events], but they contain the personal recollection of important stories."

Six thousand copies of each book are printed and a digital file of each is posted on the Internet for free downloading (www.azrielifoundation.org).

About 3,000 of the books are distributed free of charge to public libraries across Canada, and they're also offered to schools. "Our aim is to have these stories known, particularly in upper high school and colleges, and in book clubs," Azrieli said.

So far, the feedback about the program has been excellent,. "You get the sense of the person's life and how they experienced it, and how they remember," Azrieli said.

The stories possess a universal message that appeals beyond the Jewish community. They have particular resonance in immigrant groups who fled political strife before starting new lives in Canada, she added.

Water can be found in unexpected places, prof says

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Hydrology is an area that has the scientific community's attention, specifically regarding methods of water treatment, Brian Berkowitz says.

Even with the $400 billion that have been invested in water treatments, there are two questions we still need to ask ourselves, he said: first, do we know how to protect ourselves, and second, do we know what to look for?

A professor at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel, Berkowitz said that since the hydrological cycle is a closed system – meaning there is no beginning or end to it – we are never in danger of completely running out of water, as there are always places where it can be accessed, besides obvious ones like lakes and rivers.

"The vast majority of the world's water is underground, stored in the pores and cracks of rocks," he said.

The key problem is water quality, he said. There are thousands of potentially hazardous contaminants that end up in our water supply as waste by-products, including industrial substances, agrochemicals, domestic products, heavy metals and biological elements. These products often don't get broken down, making them difficult to manage, he said at a lecture on "Water, Energy and the Environment: Science and Sustainability," sponsored by Weizmann Science Canada and the Israel Chamber of Commerce.

In the presentation at the Park Hyatt Hotel last month, Berkowitz referred to the give and take nature of the various water treatment methods used as a "zero-sum game… [that is] sometimes you win, and sometimes you lose," he said.

In speaking of water and the environment with respect to water flow and precipitation, he illustrated in his presentation that Israel tries to incorporate a prevention and mediation technique that involves predicting contaminant transport patterns through lab analysis of water movement.

Several desalination methods have been tried with varying degrees of success. Hadera, a city in southern Israel, is home to the world's largest desalination plant, built in 2005. Berkowitz said desalination, which involves the removal of salt and harmful minerals from water, is the best method of water treatment available today.

One desalination technique used is in-situ/ex-situ pump treatment, involving the excavation of water from wells for purification. This gets rid of chlorine molecules in the water so that the contaminants can degrade at a faster rate.

Other methods include the oxidation of industrial effluents, which "is considered extremely cost efficient… and yields excellent results"; air injection, which "causes significant reduction of hydraulic conductivity and volumetric fluid flow"; and Poleris carbon sequestration, which "turns carbon dioxide into rock."

In a news report illustrating Israel's leadership in this area, shown prior to Berkowitz's presentation, American news broadcaster Dan Rather spoke of the booming Israeli scientific community. Israel has more scientists and researchers per capita than any other country in the world, Rather said, and since its inception in 1934, the Weizmann Institute of Science has earned over 200 patents and $100 million for discoveries involving high-tech security and medicine.

Despite the progress that has been made, Berkowitz said that Israel "has no choice but to build more desalination plants."

Settlements aren't the obstacle to peace

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Since the White House meeting on May 18 between U.S President Barack Obama and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, there has been intense media focus on their disagreement over the issue of settlements. While accepting a halt to new settlement construction, Netanyahu has rejected Obama's opposition to "natural growth" of existing settlements. Nevertheless, several Israeli analysts have pointed out that although contentious, the issue of settlements is not, contrary to popular misconception, the major stumbling block to a possible peace deal.

For one thing, the settlement matter, though undeniably a complicating factor on which even Israeli opinion is divided, is resolvable. In fact, at the Camp David and Taba negotiations (in 2000-01), there was general agreement that a very small percentage of the western part of the West Bank, where about 75 per cent of the settlers live in blocs around Jerusalem, would be incorporated into Israel in exchange for Israeli land that would be transferred to the Palestinians. (It's important to remember that these negotiations foundered not on settlements, but on then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat's refusal to recognize any Jewish claim to Jerusalem.)

Barack Obama

In his May 28 Globe and Mail article, "The politics behind the West Bank settlement fight," Patrick Martin correctly noted the compromise involving the settlement blocs, but incorrectly wrote that Obama (along with PA President Mahmoud Abbas) said that settlements "are the biggest single obstacle to peace." In fact, Obama, consistent with the policy of several previous U.S. administrations, maintains only that settlements are an obstacle to peace. But, again, this is something that is resolvable and, indeed, had moved to resolution several years ago.

What are far greater obstacles to peace, though they receive relatively scant media attention, are the Palestinians' refusal to recognize Jewish sovereign legitimacy (the source of Arafat's rejection of the Jewish historical and religious attachment to Jerusalem, and, arguably, Abbas' refusal to acknowledge Israel as the Jewish state), and their insistence on the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to present-day Israel.

In a rare but exceptionally revealing look at Abbas' rigidity, the Washington Post's Jackson Diehl ("Abbas's waiting game" May 29), noted the onus that Obama has placed on Netanyahu regarding the settlement issue and the explicit endorsement of a "two-state" solution – long accepted in principle by the majority of Israelis. However, Diehl then wrote the following about the Palestinian leader:

"But Palestinians remain a long way from swallowing reality as well. Setting aside Hamas and its insistence that Israel must be liquidated, Abbas – usually described as the most moderate of Palestinian leaders – last year helped doom Netanyahu's predecessor, Ehud Olmert, by rejecting a generous outline for Palestinian statehood."

Diehl added that, in an interview with the Post, "Abbas acknowledged that Olmert had shown him a map proposing a Palestinian state on 97 per cent of the West Bank – though he complained that the Israeli leader refused to give him a copy of the plan. He confirmed that Olmert 'accepted the principle' of the 'right of return' of Palestinian refugees – something no previous Israeli prime minister had done – and offered to resettle thousands in Israel. In all, Olmert's peace offer was more generous to the Palestinians than either that of [former U.S. presidents George W.] Bush or Bill Clinton; it's almost impossible to imagine Obama, or any Israeli government, going further.

"Abbas turned it down. 'The gaps were wide,' he said."

(It should be noted that while Olmert's offers to Abbas were indeed generous, he did not accept a "right of return" as a principle – that would be an impossible demand for any Israeli leader.)

Shedding more light on the issue, Abbas' chief negotiator, Saeb Erekat, told Al Jazeera TV (March 27) that when Olmert raised the Jewish claim to the Temple Mount, Abbas, (like Arafat almost a decade ago) defiantly uttered "I am not in the marketplace or bazaar. I came to demarcate the borders of Palestine – the June 4, 1967 borders [when the Old City including the Temple Mount and the Western Wall were under exclusive Jordanian control] – without detracting a single inch, and without detracting a single stone from Jérusalem, or from the holy Christian and Muslim places." Erekat added: "This is why the Palestinian negotiators did not sign."

This hardline, rejectionist Palestinian attitude is why Obama's confrontation with Netanyahu over settlements will almost certainly have no effect in addressing the real obstacles to peace.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Wedding customs can vary widely

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

For different reasons, the month of June is known as wedding month for Jews and non-Jews alike.

In a Jewish wedding ceremony, there are literally dozens of minhagim (customs).

Sephardi and Ashkenazi weddings have the same essential components: a chupah, the first blessings with wine, the giving of an item of value by the groom to the bride, the ketubah (the marital agreement), the Sheva Brachot (the seven blessings) and the shattering of a glass at some point.

Beyond the basics, local custom comes into play.

The first item that comes to mind is the very location where weddings take place. Ashkenazi custom suggests that they take place under open sky, whereas Sephardi custom expects the ceremony to take place in a synagogue. In fact, at the conclusion of the ceremony, the bride and groom are called upon to stand before the open Ark and offer their personal prayers for their future together.

One reason for this difference is that Sephardi Jews lived in countries where Islam prevailed, whereas Ashkenazi Jews' host countries were mostly Christian. Getting married in a house of worship was, therefore, deemed "churchy" and shunned altogether infavour of the outdoors and open sky. In Muslim lands, no such statement of differentiation was necessary.

The ketubah itself, a legally binding document, has many variances. The Ashkenazi monetary value of the ketubah remains numerically as it was since its inception in talmudic times, at 200 or 100 zuzim for first and subsequent matrimonies, respectively. The monetary figure of the Sephardi ketubah is in the prevailing currency and usually in multiples of Chai (18), or of five, such as 55,555, since in numeric mythology, the number five – as in "hamsa" – has inherent energy to overcome the evil eye of jealousy.

Another noteworthy difference in the Sephardi ketubah is the stipulation that the groom agrees to marry one wife only. Here again, the reason is geographic. Polygamy, of course, is wholly condoned in biblical Judaism. But, as previously noted, Ashkenazi Jews lived in Christian societies, which viewed polygamy very negatively and would have characterized Jews and Judaism as primitive, base and contemptible if they persisted in practising it. Rabenu Gershon, in 10th century Germany, thus disallowed the practice of being married to more than one wife simultaneously.

In contrast, for Sephardi Jews living in Islamic lands and among men for whom multiple wives are commonplace to this very day, no such taboo presented itself. Hence, couples would voluntarily stipulate that they would remain just that – a couple.

Other differences: women in Sephardi weddings don't begin the ceremony by circling the groom three or seven times. As well, the chupah itself differs from community to community. In Yemenite weddings, it's essentially non-existent. The groom wears a tallit and simply spreads it over the head of his bride, which then serves as a chupah. The custom of the eastern Sephardim and communities of Spanish and Portuguese Jews is that the bride and the mothers sit enthroned under the chupah while the men stand before them during the ceremony.

In Jewish marriages, distinct roles are allocated to men and women, something that's perhaps not easily accepted among people with contemporary attitudes. The running of the home and the family are the purview of the wife, whereas the religious/spiritual direction and pace is the man's department. To affirm this division of roles, it's the Sephardi custom that during the wedding itself, the groom symbolically and ever so slightly steps over the foot of the bride.

I will always warmly remember my beloved rebbe, Rabbi Tzvi Pruzansky of blessed memory – a man who proudly and staunchly upheld Ashkenazi custom, particularly that of the venerated Litvak tradition – quietly leaning over my shoulder as my own chupah was about to begin and instructing me to slightly step over the foot of my bride.

"It is a good thing to do," he said.

Apparently, with or without our realization, while our respective customs may differ, we have more in common than we give ourselves credit for.

Students flock to support Israel

The sight of Israeli flags and pro-Israel signs around Toronto on May 24 was awe-inspiring. They were everywhere. Students of all ages, from grade school to university, and from across Canada, joined forces with their fellow Jews to walk in support of Israel.

ON CAMPUS
By Justin Dahan

The annual, community-wide Walk With Israel is organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. This year, it collected donations in support of Bat Yam's Ethioplan-Israeli community. The money will help the Ethiopians integrate into the community and hopefully have a better life. In the end, some $400,000 was raised in support of this noble cause.

AEPi, the Jewish fraternity, didn't have an official role in the walk, but unofficially, members of AEPi from the University of Toronto, York University, McMaster University, the University of Guelph, Queen's University, the University of Ottawa and others were a strong presence and collected numerous donations.

Through this event, the federation was able to show how many supporters there are of Israel. The walk gave people who may not be very involved in the Jewish community an opportunity to support their beliefs and feel like they're part of something. No matter the age, everyone was unified, walking together for a common cause.

Jewish students at York have spent the year facing anti-Zionist rallies and demonstrations. At times, they've felt intimidated and isolated as a result. There is strong Jewish leadership at York. Ilan Mann, president of York's AEPi chapter, and Daniel Ferman, president of Hillel at York, have spent many hours and the majority of the year trying to combat the hostile environment at their school.

York students were able to see first-hand how many people beyond their campus feel the same way they do. This event helped to strengthen the Jewish community as well as raise money. It was a huge success in both respects.

The walk was not all positive. A few protesters met them along the way. Not in Our Name is a Jewish group that protests against Israel and Zionism. As it does every year, the group tried to disrupt the walk by holding signs opposing the walk's message. A few examples of the signs were as follows: "Jews in Solidarity with Gaza," "Jewish Voices Opposing Zionism," and, "Canada, Stop Funding Israel's War Machine."

Despite this attempt to sour the day, the event went off without a hitch. The protesters proved that although we have our detractors, we can still band together to overcome the challenges they present. The fact the protesters were outmatched is a testament to the fact that when we come together, our collective voice cannot be defeated.

Jewish Life

We're just doing what's required

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

It's graduation season. In the coming weeks tens of thousands of college, high school and even kindergarten students will march down the aisle with Pomp and Circumstance playing in the background.

Proud parents and grandparents, accompanied by bored siblings, will look on with pride as their loved ones receive a diploma with the left hand and shake with the right. Pictures will be taken, flowers will be given and caps will be tossed in the air.

What is the value of a diploma?

A university degree was once a symbol of a quality education. Attending university meant devoting four years to learning, reading, growing. It meant entrenching oneself in academia, spending quality time with professors, debating with peers and developing critical thinking.

Today, we have commodified education. Tuition is seen as an investment that will pay off with higher salaries and better jobs. The average college graduate will, over his lifetime, earn double the salary of a peer with only a high school diploma.

At the same time, the academic challenge of university has changed. As graduate students take on a larger portion of the teaching load, professors are becoming less available to students. With rising tuition fees, more students are forced to take on part-time jobs at the sacrifice of hours spent studying.

It is now nearly a universal norm that high school will end after Grade 12 and a university degree will be awarded after four years of study. Policies such as the American "no child left behind" only reinforce the mechanical nature of our educational system that is designed toward credentialing rather than educating.

Our Jewish system has undergone similar changes.

Becoming a bar mitzvah was once a demarcation of maturity and ability. No matter what age, after a child learned sufficient text, the rabbi of a community would assess the child's suitability to become a bar mitzvah – a son of the commandments. If the child was ready – both in terms of content knowledge and maturity – at the age of 10, he would take on the responsibilities of an adult at that age. If it wasn't felt he was suitably prepared until he reached 14, he would wait until the right time. This system challenged youths to learn and grow while making the bar mitzvah more than a birthday celebration, but rather a celebration of maturity.

A similar phenomena took place with smichah, rabbinic ordination. Preparation to become a rabbi was once a journey rather than a track. Students would begin learning under the tutelage of a specific rabbi. After years of study, the rabbi would (or would not) decide that the student was ready to receive the title rabbi and the authority and responsibility that comes along with it.

Recognizing the challenge of subjectivity associated with this form of personalized ordination, rabbinical schools today have a set curriculum of four or five years. Pending successful completion of this curriculum, without the other factors that once went into ordination, a student will "graduate" and earn the title rabbi.

I am not arguing for teachers to begin assigning F's or for bar mitzvah celebrations to be moved away from the 13th birthday. I am, however, suggesting that we have to see graduations and bar mitzvahs as more than simply the successful completion of a list of requirements.

I yearn for the day when students will sit down for a cup of coffee with a teacher to learn from them, rather than to squabble over a mark. I dream of students reading books on the "suggested" reading list distributed at the beginning of a semester, rather than simply skimming the articles on the "required" list.

The place for our community to start is the bar mitzvah. We have to transform the event from a perfunctory birthday celebration, which often marks the end of Hebrew school, into a rite of initiation marking the beginning of an active, individualized Jewish life.

Baseball and Judaism

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Question: What is God's favourite sport?

Answer: Baseball. Because the first words of the Bible are: "In the Big Inning." [tinyurl.com/bsbll01]

Although Judaism may be a bit older than baseball, the religion and the sport seem to have much in common.

Rabbi (and Red Sox fan) Mitchell Hurvitz writes that "to the uninformed eye, Jewish rituals or the rules of baseball would seem strange. Within both venues, there are rules for when to stand, touch your heart, and remove or place back your head covering. The rabbi interprets the Torah, and the umpire interprets the rules of baseball. Judaism wants you to walk God's path, without getting out of line, and the same is true for running the bases toward 'home.'" [tinyurl.com/bsbll02]

Rabbi Richard Angler of Boca Raton's Congregation B'nai Israel sees many parallels between Judaism and baseball. Both are firmly rooted in history, for instance. Just as "every baseball game is part of every other baseball game that has ever been played… We say that when a Jew is born we are already 4,000 years old… Judaism, like baseball, like family, like everything of value in life works best when we make the long-term commitment to it." [tinyurl.com/bsbll03]

For Neil Rubin, the timing of the start of the baseball season says it all. "Funny how it always coincides with Passover, which is about our birth as a nation with one focus – reaching the Promised Land (the World Series), and about coming from the evils of Egypt (a dark, wet winter)." And then there are the personal memories of Baltimore's Memorial Stadium. While everyone else is feasting on soft pretzels and Coke, Neil munched on matzah, macaroons and Passover soda. "If you can keep the faith on opening day, we all agreed, you can be a Jew anywhere, anytime." [tinyurl.com/bsbll04]

Half a century ago, the Lubavitcher Rebbe asked a visiting bar mitzvah boy about his favourite game. When he responded "baseball," the Rebbe explained the special lesson to a boy coming of age. "In your heart, you have a big field. The two sides are the yetzer tov – the good inclination – and the yetzer hara – the negative drives. Until now they played kids' stuff, but from now on the game's for real. Remember, just as in baseball, the side which plays best will win. If you only want to, you can always overcome your yetzer hara." [tinyurl.com/bsbll05]

Although Sandy Koufax famously sat out pitching on Yom Kippur, let's say the temptation was too great for Phillies fan David Bedein. In 1964, he took an afternoon detour on the second day of Rosh Hashanah to take in a game at Connie Mack Stadium. There was no joy in Philly that year, and David has always felt responsible. [tinyurl.com/bsbll06]

I'm not sure the mystics of Safed had baseball in mind when they compiled their esoteric teachings in the 16th century. (Or for that matter, there are no reports of Abner Doubleday dabbling in the Zohar.) But that hasn't stopped Reuven Goldfarb from writing his Baseball Kabbalah. In it, he provides indisputable parallels between the two mystical activities.

- The 10 players (nine plus batter) on the field correspond to the number of Sefirot (divine emanations) that constitute the kabbalistic tree of life.
- "What about the umpires? Easy. They're Dayanim (rabbinical judges). That's why they wear dark colors. Managers? Rebbes. Coaches? Gabbais."
- "And you've heard of the seventh inning stretch? Does that sound like Shabbat to you?" [tinyurl.com/bsbll07]

Now let's return to Rabbi Hurvitz for a few last thoughts. Something does perplex the rabbi. "For some, strange and unfathomable reason" his son roots for the Baltimore Orioles. He writes in the Greenwich Citizen, "When I go with my son to Camden Yards, and daven Minchah with him, I think I'll add a private prayer to my silent devotion time: 'God, thank you for the joys of life and the wisdom to create balance between body and spirit. Thank you for granting me a child who loves his Judaism as much as he loves his games. Thank you for allowing us the blessings of America, and each and every day. And God, please whisper in my son's ear to reconsider rooting for my Red Sox.'"

Parliamentary coalition formed to fight anti-Semitism

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A coalition of parliamentarians from all parties has been formed to conduct a national inquiry into anti-Semitism in Canada.

The group, known as the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism (CPCCA,) includes 21 members of Parliament and is divided into a steering committee chaired by Conservative MP Scott Reid and an inquiry panel chaired by Liberal MP Mario Silva.

Details of the CPCCA were unveiled at a June 2 press conference on Parliament Hill attended by many of its members as well as interested representatives of various Jewish group.

Liberal MP and noted human rights advocate Irwin Cotler introduced the CPCCA, providing background on how and why it was formed. He prefaced his remarks by quoting Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel's recent remarks about his fears of the resurgence of global anti-Semitism: "I must confess to you, I have not felt the way I feel now since 1945. I feel there are reasons for us to be concerned, even afraid… now is the time to mobilize the efforts of all humanity."

Cotler added his own endorsement of the need for the CPCCA.

"Silence is not an option. The time has come not only to sound the alarm, but to act. For as history has taught us only too well [that] while it may begin with Jews, it does not end with Jews," he said.

Reid echoed the sentiment, adding that "anti-Semitism is an affront to Canadian values." He read from the mission statement of the CPCCA, which "recognizes that anti-Semitism by its nature is fundamentally opposed to the multicultural identity of Canada and to the Canadian values of Human Rights and Human Dignity. It harnesses the goodwill of parliamentarians in all parties… in the struggle against this oldest and most enduring of hatreds."

The inquiry panel will include seven members from the Liberal party, seven members from the Conservative party; and two each from the Bloc Québecois and the NDP, Silva said.

"Our Canadian values are eroded when people are unable to live without fear," he said.

The CPCCA is an independent body and will not be funded by the government, NGOs or Jewish organizations. It will only accept funding that won't compromise its mandate. It has applied for various grants and will disclose funding sources when they come through.

It is associated with the Interparliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism, an international steering committee that organized a conference in London earlier this year.

The Canadian delegation was the largest single group, with 12 parliamentarians attending the London conference.

From now until the end of July, the CPCCA is inviting written submissions from individuals, groups or organizations on the subject of anti-Semitism in Canada.

Beginning this fall, committee members are hoping to travel to regions across the country to hear witness testimonies. The number and location of these meetings will depend on the committee's budget, which has yet to be determined. The public will be informed, however, when the schedule becomes available, and the hearings will be open to the public.

Following the hearings, a report will be drafted and submitted to the government of Canada.

In a statement, Mark Freiman, new president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, said it was "sad" that such a committee had to be formed and lamented that the lessons learned from the Holocaust seemed to be fading.

Congress said it will work with the coalition to combat anti-Semitism.

In a separate statement, the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center's president and CEO Avi Benlolo hailed the formation of the coalition and said his organization would "support this inquiry and provide any required resources at its disposal."

Govt., opposition craft their own bills for terror victims

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canada now has two competing legislative initiatives to help victims of terror sue terror groups and states that sponsor them – one put forward by the government, the other by members of the opposition.

At the 29th plenary of Canadian Jewish Congress earlier this month, Prime Minister Stephen Harper announced that his government is tabling new legislation to allow Canadian victims of terrorism to sue for redress.

Last week, Liberal MPs Irwin Cotler and Bob Rae announced that they have drafted a similar bill that contrasts with the government's Justice for Victims of Terrorism act, which they contend "does not adequately protect the rights of victims."

The government's legislation, Bill C-35, went through first reading in the House of Commons on June 2.

Cotler's opposing legislation was tabled June 4.

The government bill is intended to "allow any person who can demonstrate a real and substantial connection between their cause of action and Canada to sue in a Canadian court the foreign states that perpetrate and support terrorism. Plaintiffs can seek redress for terrorist acts committed anywhere in the world on, or after, 1 January 1985," according to the Ministry of Public Safety's website.

In its current form, Bill C-35 would allow victims who win their cases to "request assistance from the ministers of foreign affairs and finance to identify and locate the [defendant's] assets under Canadian jurisdiction of the state."

Failure to comply with a verdict could "expose the defendant to seizure of assets and property."

Bernie Farber

But the government cautions plaintiffs that if defendants have assets located in jurisdictions other than Canada, plaintiffs would have to "follow the process of the foreign state for recognition of the judgment and subsequently take necessary measures to execute the judgment in that country."

Bill C-35 would amend the current State Immunity Act by lifting immunity for states listed by Canada as "supporters of terrorism."

The Cotler and Rae legislation, tabled as Bill C-408, features most of the same legal measures as Bill C-35, but "does not shield itself behind an escape clause that renders it completely ineffective until foreign states are named on a case-by-case basis. Such an approach politicizes justice," Cotler told the House in introducing his bill last week, referring to the government's proposed legislation.

When asked to clarify the major difference between the bills, a spokesperson for Cotler told The CJN that the Liberal initiative would not require the government to name a foreign state to have its immunity from Canadian prosecution lifted. Rather, it could be lifted during a plaintiff's court proceedings, freeing the government from the potential politically messy act of calling out other states as sponsors of terror.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber praised both the government and the Cotler-Rae legal initiatives as being devices that would provide "self empowerment" to Canadians victimized by "the sad reality" of terrorism.

"We have been very supportive of this [legal] concept for a long time," Farber told The CJN. "We have here a situation where all [parties] are embracing the concept of this legislation."

He added that regardless of which bill becomes law, "at the very least we're going to have a situation where Canadians can take personal action, and I think that's good."

Court to decide if Montreal builders can be sued for W. Bank construction

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Quebec court will decide whether a lawsuit against two Canadian-based companies that are alleged to have illegally constructed residential buildings for Jewish settlers on disputed land in the West Bank can be heard here.

On June 22, 23 and 25, Quebec Superior Court is scheduled to hear a motion from the firms' lawyer to dismiss the case.

The lawsuit, filed last July by the municipal council of the Palestinian village of Bil'in and one of its residents, claims that the companies, Green Mount International and Green Park International, which are registered in Quebec, are violating international and Canadian law.

If the motions to dismiss are rejected, it would be the first time that any foreign court has agreed to hear a suit against a corporation for construction of Jewish settlements on territory under dispute between Palestinians and Israelis.

Lawsuit filed by Palestinian village and one of its residents

The companies' lawyer, Ronald Levy, denounced the suit as "a media exercise intended to besmirch Israel; they don't care if they win or not, they just want attention. We consider this an abusive action."

Levy has filed three motions outlining why a Quebec court shouldn't hear the case. The first main argument is that Israeli courts have determined that the individual plaintiff, Ahmed Issa Abdallah Yassin, was not the owner of the land on which the companies built. Yassin, who was head of the village council, died this year and his heirs are now named. In addition, Levy said the village itself can't be a plaintiff, only its residents.

The second argument is that because this is a civil matter, it's justiciable only where the alleged grievance happened, and the third, closely related, is that there is no aspect of this case that places it under the jurisdiction of a Canadian court.

"The fact that the companies are registered in Quebec is irrelevant," Levy said.

Emily Schaeffer, the Israeli lawyer representing the plaintiffs, held a press conference outside the Montreal courthouse on June 4 to outline the arguments she, with Canadian lead lawyer Mark Arnold of Toronto, will be making.

Their case is based primarily on Canada's 2000 Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Act, which ratified its obligations under the Rome Statutes of the International Criminal Court. They include a prohibition against an occupying power from transferring its civilian population into territory occupied as a result of war, which is also contained in the Geneva Conventions.

She said that while the case was lost in Israel, an argument based on international humanitarian law was not made "because Israeli courts never consider violations of international law" in such cases. "The Israeli government holds that this is state land, and that it has legitimate title… [Any contestation of that] is considered a political discussion and not for legal debate."

The U.S.-born Schaeffer said there's a precedent for a foreign court deciding it has jurisdiction to hear a lawsuit against a company from its country involving territory disputed by Israel and the Palestinians. The French company Veolia was sued in a French court for its construction of a tram line between west and east Jerusalem, she said, although that is now being appealed.

Montreal was the first stop on an 11-city cross-Canada tour that Schaeffer was scheduled to make leading up to June 22. She is publicizing the plight of the residents of Bil'in, a village of about 1,800 west of Ramallah near the Israeli security barrier.

For the past four years, Bil'in and its international supporters have been contesting the loss of part of its land due to the erection of the security barrier. In 2007, the Israeli Supreme Court ruled the adjacent Jewish settlement of Modi'in Illit could expand onto that land.

The Bil'in plaintiffs are asking for three things in the lawsuit: a declaration that the companies' construction is illegal under Canadian and international law; the demolition of the buildings and restoration of the land to the way it was, and $2 million in punitive damages from the companies, as well as $25,000 from their sole known officer and director, Annette Laroche, a resident of Deux-Montagnes.

could suffer a similar fate in the future. So far, however, there has been no such messaging at Montreal Pride, according to Joey Waknin, president of Ga'ava, the fledgling non-profit group for lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgendered (LGBT) Jews in Montreal.

The Toronto situation has also prompted the creation of a new group called Holy Queer – a Montreal-based, national Zionist queer group promoting gay life in Israel through political activism. It emerged last week on Facebook and Twitter, seeking representatives across the country to counter fallacies about gay rights in Israel.

"We are still formulating our response to both Toronto's decision and potentially Montreal. We do plan to respond in one way or another," said Josh Fagan, vice-president of Holy Queer.

Although QuAIA sparked controversy among Jewish participants over its appearance at the 2008 Toronto Pride Parade, for Pride organizers, the controversy wasn't due to the group's political message, Sandilands said. Rather, as an unregistered group, it posed an "insurance liability."

Asked whether she felt her organization has now opened itself up to the potential for hateful messages in the parade and the usurpation of Pride's traditionally peaceful, inclusive vibe, Sandilands told The CJN that security will be augmented this year.

"We have no intention of allowing anyone to be harassed at any point and have every intention of ensuring the safety of all participants in any aspect of the festival," she said.

Sandilands said the number of parade marshals has been increased from 25 to 80 this year and that any unregistered marchers trying to sneak in will be "removed."

Martin Gladstone, a Toronto-based Jewish gay lawyer who has witnessed the anti-Israel messaging in past parades, implored Pride organizers to remain apolitical, arguing that allowing any group with a political mandate to march in the parade is contrary to Pride's non-profit "LGBT human rights mandate," and that "gay pride has nothing to do with anti-Israel advocacy."

Gladstone said he feared that the rise of anti-Israel, "and by extension anti-Jewish," political messaging could threaten Pride's existence and funding if legally challenged.

"The law is clear," he wrote to the Pride council this year. "You cannot allow a non-profit corporation to facilitate political advocacy unrelated to its charter."

Sandilands countered, telling The CJN that "allowing all sides in any political debate to be part of our parade demonstrates the non-partisan nature of our event."

She added: "If we allowed QuAIA but refused another that represented a pro-Israeli position without good reason, that would be taking a partisan position. Even then, such a move would not threaten our non-profit status. There are no restrictions on political activity by non-profits. Only those entries that actively contravene the hate crimes laws of the country or our anti-discrimination policies will be removed."

But current Jewish registrants and some potential parade attendees remained fearful for their safety, as well as disappointed and skeptical of Pride's decision last week to allow QuAIA to participate.

Wendy Lampert, Canadian Jewish Congress' director of community relations, said she hoped the Pride organizers understand the potential "discomfort" they would cause Jewish community members by including the group.

Justine Apple, executive director of Kulanu, a Jewish LGBT social group affiliated with Hillel of Greater Toronto, said her 300-member organization sought a meeting with Sandilands and the Pride executive prior to this year's celebrations to explain their concerns and requested that their parade position be moved "far away" from QuAIA's.

Sandilands has agreed to meet with Kulanu, but a date had not been set as of The CJN's deadline.

"We decided that for the first time, this year, we will march and hold Israeli flags… to show our pride as Jews, gay Jews and in solidarity with Israel," Apple said, acknowledging that while not normally a political one, her organization reluctantly decided to counter QuAIA's political message with one of their own.

As of last week, Kulanu was the sole Jewish group registered to march in the parade, although representatives of Jewish Family and Child will be marching with group members.

But Apple said Sandilands offered to "open up" the registration process beyond the official application deadline if other Jewish organizations decide they want to participate.

Adding to the concerns of Jewish community members is the fact that the parade's grand marshal, El-Farouk Khaki – a Toronto lawyer and political activist – is an outspoken critic of Israel.

When questioned about the choice of Khaki as grand marshal, Sandilands said Khaki has assured Pride Toronto that he won't deliver anti-Israel messages while in his Pride role.

Last month, QuAIA convened a meeting at a Toronto theatre titled "Coming OUT Against Apartheid: 20 Years of Queer Resistance from South Africa to Palestine."

The event's stated aim was to encourage members and like-minded individuals to turn out for Pride week and "reignite Toronto's queer community in the fight against [Israeli] apartheid" according to an online flyer for the event.

Khaki was scheduled to deliver the opening remarks at the meeting and his organization, Salaam – a Muslim gay community support group – co-sponsored the meeting along with the University of Toronto chapter of the Ontario Public Interest Research Group (OPIRG).

OPIRG has 10 other chapters across the province and has refused to work with Jewish campus groups in the past, because it doesn't believe Zionism fits within its social justice and human rights mandates.

Israel is the only country in the Middle East with gay rights enshrined in state law, but QuAIA and OPIRG claim that "Israel has now begun to frame itself as a tolerant, queer-positive democracy. This can never be reality under occupation."

Jake Peters, a Jewish AIDS activist, attended the QuAIA meeting and said he was stunned at the "one-sided… hypocritical attacks on Israel" and the calls for protests and boycotts against the Jewish state that were made at the event.

"I think that people who wish to demonstrate against Israel have every right to do so, but not in the Pride Parade. I don't think they should be allowed to manipulate Pride in this way, to turn it into an ugly, scapegoating spectacle," Peters said.

In addition to corporate sponsorship, Pride Week 2008 received public funding in excess of $450,000 – $300,000 from the province of Ontario through the Ministry of Tourism, $119,000 from the City of Toronto and another $35,000 from Heritage Canada.

It will receive no funding from Heritage Canada this year, but only because Pride didn't apply for funding in time, a Heritage Canada spokesperson said.

Ontario has once again given $300,000 to Pride this year.

A spokesperson for the Ontario Ministry of Tourism said the ministry had "been assured that [anti-Israel messaging at the parade] last year was an isolated incident and understand from Pride Toronto that they have mitigation plans in place for this year."

Attempts by The CJN to speak with a representative of the City of Toronto were unsuccessful.

Amy Hanen, senior manager of community relations for TD Canada Trust, one of the major sponsors of Pride Week, said the bank was aware of the political nature of some of the parade's participants, but said that "TD would not be associated with any event or initiative with an agenda founded on racism or anti-Semitism."

L'chaim Retirement Home

If your kids like your banana cake, you'll love L'chaim.

What does banana cake (or sponge cake, or honey cake) have to do with L'chaim Retirement Home? A lot, actually.

When your kids brag about your cake, do they say it's the biggest? No. Do they say it's the best? Absolutely. IT TASTES LIKE HOME.

Like your banana cake, we're not the biggest. But we make life a sweet experience for our residents, and welcome the opportunity to share it with you. — Judy Cohen, Founder

Junior Set

This 8-year-old is a born fundraiser

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

As Noa Wolfe, 8, the inventor of Spring-a-Majiggers, sets up her display table on her front lawn, a young family passing by inquires about purchasing one of her colourful handmade toys, a pompom head on a spring that bounces into a cup.

Although she's not really set up for business, Noa is not one to turn down a sale, not when 50 per cent of the money will be going toward the Children's Wish Foundation, a charity that attempts to fulfil the wishes of children afflicted with a high-risk or life-threatening illness.

Noa has sold the Spring-a-Majiggers outside of a Starbucks on Eglinton Avenue in Toronto and at school fairs.

On this sunny morning, she is selling a $2 Spring-a-Majigger to Jordane Frankel and Josh Picov. Their 13-month-old daughter, Ella, may not yet be old enough to play with this toy, but she happily waddles over to Noa to check out her wares.

But there is actually another child who is going to benefit more directly from this sale than young Ella. The money Noa is raising through the Children's Wish Foundation is designated for Jonah, a five- year-old boy with acute lymphoblastic leukemia. He has wished for a trip to Disney World with his family, which will take place later this year.

Noa likes the idea of knowing who the money will be going to, says her mother, speech pathologist Karen Halpern.

She describes her daughter as a born fundraiser. She has previously sold lemonade, bookmarks and jewelry for various children charities, and she has even donated her birthday money.

So far, sales of Spring-a-Majiggers have brought in more than $300 for the Children's Wish Foundation, Halpern says.

Last year, the Fieldstone Day School second-grader gave up nine inches of her hair to Panteen Beautiful Lengths, a program connected to the Canadian Cancer Society.

Halpern describes her daughter as a creative child, explaining that Noa designed the toy, which can spring into a cup or sit on the end of a pencil. "John Bead, an arts and crafts company, donated one round of pompoms and wooden bases to us," Halpern says.

Noa also paints the bases with inspirational messages such as "Think Big" or "Be You," and she uses hot glue to attach the beads and spring to the pompom.

Halpern says her daughter likes to call everything a "thing-a-majigger," and that's how she came up with the name Spring-a-Majiggers.

And her sales pitch also has some punch: "A cute buddy to put a spring into your day."

For more information about Spring-a-Majiggers, contact Halpern at 416-787-2882 or karen.halpern@rogers.com

Lisa: It's so hard to believe that 5 years have passed since we saw your beautiful face and held your hand. There are no words to describe how much you are missed, and we hope that you're proud of the way we've tried to live our lives in your honour.

Many exciting things have happened over the past 5 years and we have often wondered, "what would Lisa be thinking?". We know you'd be crazy about your beautiful nieces and amazed at how much Becky reminds us of you. We're sure you'd be proud (and scratching your head) that Jen is going to med school; that you'd be overjoyed by Mikey's recent marriage, and would be best friends with your new sister Ilana. You would be beaming with pride at your beautiful sister Katie, and so happy that she shares your love of writing and creating. You would be inspired by Jackie's work in Africa, and thrilled for Robin as she begins her new family. You would be so touched by "Lisa's tree" that grows in Dad and Olivia's yard, as a living tribute to your strength and kindness.

Most of all, you would be amazed at how we've pulled together, sharing birthdays and laughs and celebrating your precious memory. You continue to inspire everyone who loves you, and you've had a lasting impact on so many lives.

We love you with all our hearts!

P.S. Hartsee says you'd be ecstatic that he finally got that hole in one.

SHULMAN: Monty H. at Grand River Hospital, K-W Health Care Centre on Thursday, May 28th, 2009, peacefully surrounded by his loving family.

Monty Shulman aged 88 years.

Monty was a good and faithful member of Beth Jacob Synagogue and prior to moving to Kitchener had been very active with the B'nai Israel Congregation in Cambridge until 1974, and had served proudly with the British Army in the Second World War. Loving father to Elliott of Toronto and Ben of Waterloo, dear Zaidy to Asa, David, and Michael, brother to Myra and her husband Bert Shinwell of Toronto, also survived by many nieces and nephews.

Pre-deceased by his parents Solomon Shulman and Rena Franklin, his beloved wife Lee in November of last year and one sister, Ethel. A funeral service was held on May 31st from Beth Jacob Synagogue at 12 noon with Rabbi Yosil Rosenzweig officiating. Donations may be made to the charity of your choice as expressions of sympathy though the Ratz-Bechtel Funeral Home, 519-745-9495. Shiva was observed at the family residence, 175 Queen St. N., Apt. #1703 in Kitchener.

Prof explores journey of Dead Sea Scrolls

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Israeli archeologist and professor Dan Bahat was in Toronto last week to share his extensive knowledge about the history and content of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Dan Bahat

Sporting a mustache that hockey legend Lanny McDonald would approve of, Bahat, a lecturer in the Land of Israel Studies and Archaeology department at Bar-Ilan University and the former district archeologist for Jerusalem, addressed hundreds who gathered at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on June 3.

The event, sponsored by Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University and Beth Tikvah, was the second part of the Arnold and Leona Finkler Memorial lecture series. Bahat spoke in advance of the launch of the Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum which runs from June 27 to Jan 7.

Although it is widely known that the scrolls were discovered by a Bedouin shepherd in 1947, buried in a cave in Qumran in the Judean Desert, Bahat went into great detail describing when and how the scrolls were found, what they reveal about Jewish history and how Israel came to possess them.

"When I speak about the caves in the Judean desert where the Dead Sea Scrolls were found, actually, all the scrolls we're talking about come from 11 caves only," Bahat said.

He said the discovery of the first scrolls in 1947 was made on Nov. 29 – the day the United Nations adopted the Partition Plan for Palestine.

He said that of the discoveries made since then by Arab and Israeli scholars in the Judean desert – which was divided until 1967, with the northern part belonging to Jordan and the southern part belonging to Israel – all that was yielded were 900 scrolls, of which 20 are practically intact while all the others are fragments.

When the first discovery was made, three scrolls were brought to a famous antiquities dealer in Bethlehem, Bahat said.

An Israeli professor made an inexpensive deal to purchase the three scrolls from the antiquities dealer in Bethlehem, but four other scrolls ended up with another dealer at the Syrian Jacobite Monastery of St. Mark in Jerusalem.

Bahat said that those in possession of the four scrolls were urged to send the scrolls abroad for fear that they would not be safe in war-torn Jerusalem.

When they were sent to an antiquities dealer in New York, former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff and archeologist Yigael Yadin, who was Bahat's professor, learned that the scrolls were for sale.

In 1954, Yadin purchased the scrolls for $250,000 through intermediaries because "no one would sell them to the Israelis," Bahat said.

"The first seven Dead Sea Scrolls, all of them, are property of Israel and Hebrew University [in Jerusalem where they are housed in a museum called the Shrine of the Book]."

Bahat explained that the scrolls come from two distinct periods – from the Second Temple period that ended in 70 CE, and from the era of Bar Kochba, the Jewish leader who led a revolt against the Roman Empire to establish a Jewish state, around 135 CE.

He said some of the scrolls were found in the Qumran caves and some were found at Masada.

"The discovery at Masada is more important from the point of view of dating than any other because the ones that came from the caves, some argue that they are not from the Second Temple period, that they are medieval, but when the same scrolls are being found at Masada… there is no more question. It's from 70 CE and that's the end," Bahat said.

"The important thing is that we know that [Bar Kochba's] main headquarters was in Herodion. During our excavations in Herodion, we found very considerable remains from Bar Kochba's time."

He said it's important to differentiate between the scrolls from the Second Temple period and the scrolls from Bar Kochba's time because those from Bar Kochba's time are not really scrolls, they are contracts and agreements written on papyrus.

"All of the documents are written in a very interesting way. They write beautifully and then they roll it and seal it and they put a thread through it so that no one will be able to open it," Bahat said.

"On each contract there is a continuation, which is open to view. This is written in quite a coarse way. It is a copy of the document which is sealed. Part is rolled, part is opened."

He said that other scrolls helped them learn about "the Dead Sea Scrolls people," that there was a war between those who were considered the "Sons of Light" and those who were considered the "Sons of Darkness."

While the scrolls have to be stored very carefully in order to preserve them, he said he is excited that they will be on display in Toronto.

"It has to be exactly like the conditions in the desert, which means completely dry, the same temperature all the time. You can imagine that bringing them to Toronto, for some of them, it is a great sacrifice, but the value of having them here is very important."

Resource centre helps parents counter family isolation

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Parents, grandparents and caregivers of young children can reach out to their counterparts at the Family Resource Centre, located in the Promenade Mall in Thornhill.

A joint program of Jewish Family & Child, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the centre runs on a drop-in basis, and children up to age five can take part in story time, music, and art and crafts.

Fran Chodak, a social worker who has supervised the centre for 10 years, said it gives parents a chance to talk to other parents and share ideas and concerns. "It helps them feel less isolated when they see there are other parents out there facing the same issues."

The centre also offers programs that include workshops for parents and caregivers in collaboration with Ontario Early Years, as well as a conversation cafe in partnership with JIAS, an after-school homework club, and dental screening.

A unique workshop is available to caregivers living and working in Jewish homes, Chodak said. "We teach them about keeping kosher, the holidays and Jewish traditions. We recognize that caregivers have needs, and we want them to know what to expect in a Jewish home."

In another workshop, parents talk about preserving their native language while the family learns English. "We had about 20 people at this workshop who spoke about seven or eight languages. It was a cross section of the Jewish community. It is rare to have that in one room."

A favourite weekly event is the Shabbat program, Chodak said. "We spend about 30 minutes in a circle singing songs and celebrating Shabbat."

Supported by the Trillium Foundation – the FRC has received three back-to-back grants – as well as United Way and York Region, the centre is also a source of information and referrals for a network of family services in York Region and the Greater Toronto Area, she said.

During these difficult economic times, the FRC has seen an increase in families using it, Chodak said, because "we charge a nominal fee, and many see it as an alternative to pre-school."

She called the FRC "a beautiful model that we would love to see duplicated. Instead of responding to a crisis, we are putting together programs that build a healthy community and reduce isolation. We've had a big impact on so many people."

ADORATION הוא סרטו החדש של אטום אגויאן, גדול במאי הסרטים בקנדה. אני מחכה בכליון עיניים לכל סרט חדש של אגויאן, שאהוד מאוד וזוכה לכבוד מלכים בישראל. גבור הסרט הוא נער בית ספר תיכון שבמסגרת תרגיל ספרותי בבית הספר מדדה עם בנו של טרוריסט פלשתינאי, ששלח את אימו של הילד עם פצצה למטוס של אל על. הספור מבוסס על מקרה אמיתי שקרה באירופה בשנות השמונים, כשמאבטחי אל על זיהו אשה אירלית שנשלחה לבית לחם על ידי בעלה הפלשתינאי עם פצצה במטען שלה. תפקיד הנער מגולם בצורה מרשימה, והפנטזיה שלו מעורבת בסיפור חייו האמיתי בסרט, שבה איבד את אימו ואביו.

TWO LOVERS הוא סרט נהדר למרות שמו השאבלוני, וגם בו יש נקודה ישראלית בדמותו של מוני מרשונוב שלנו, שממלא תפקיד משני די מרכזי, כאביו הישראלי של הגיבור.

Western-backed majority wins Lebanese election

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Lebanon's pro-western coalition declared victory early Monday, as local television stations covering Sunday's election reported that the group had successfully fended off a serious challenge by the Shiite militant group Hezbollah and its allies to grab the majority in parliament.

Israel's Foreign Ministry said following release of preliminary results that it was "incumbent upon any government that is formed in Beirut to ensure that Lebanon will not be used as a base for violence against the State of Israel and against Israelis... Israel considers the Lebanese government responsible for any military or other hostile activity that emanates from its territory."

Official election results were confirmed later Monday.

The election was seen as an early test of U.S. President Barack Obama's efforts to forge Middle East peace. A win by Hezbollah would have boosted the influence of its backers Iran and Syria and risked pushing one of the region's most volatile nations into international isolation, and possibly into more conflict with Israel.

"I present this victory to Lebanon," Prime Minister Fuad Siniora said on television after stations projected his pro-western coalition was winning. "It is an exceptional day for democracy in Lebanon."

OTV, the television station of one of Hezbollah's key Christian allies, former army chief Michel Aoun, conceded that the party's candidates who challenged their pro-western counterparts in several Christian districts had been defeated, preventing a victory for the Hezbollah coalition. But Aoun was able to hang on to his representation in other districts.

The pro-western coalition won 68 seats in the next parliament; Hezbollah and its allies won 57 seats; independents won three.

That would almost replicate the deadlock that existed in the outgoing parliament, in which the pro-western bloc had 70 seats and an alliance of Hezbollah and other Shiite and Christian factions had 58.

The leader of the largest bloc in the pro-western coalition, Saad Hariri, said early Monday in a televised speech that he extends his hand to the losing side to work together and seriously for the sake of Lebanon. He urged supporters to celebrate without provoking opponents.

But despite the conciliatory tone, Lebanon is at risk of again sliding into a political crisis over formation of the next government similar to the one that has buffeted the country for most of the last four years.

Hezbollah had gained veto power in Siniora's cabinet for the last year, after provoking the worst street clashes since the 1975-1990 civil war. The pro-western coalition had vowed not to give Hezbollah and its allies a blocking minority in the new government if they won.

The battle in Christian districts was the decisive factor. Lebanese generally vote along sectarian and family loyalty lines, with seats for Sunnis and Shiites in the half-Christian, half-Muslim, 128-member parliament already locked up even before the voting started.

Christians in the pro-western coalition warned that Hezbollah would bring the influence of Shiite Iran to Lebanon, threatening the country's Arab identity and its existence as a state.

Sunnis were also driven to vote for the pro-western coalition to get back at Shiite Hezbollah gunmen for seizing the streets in Beirut from pro-government supporters last year.

After polls closed, the interior ministry reported that the turnout nationwide was about 52.3 per cent, an increase over the 2005 figure of 45.8 per cent.

The race for the parliament is the first major event in the Middle East since Obama reached out to the Arab and Islamic worlds last week in his speech in Cairo, calling for a new beginning between the United States and Muslims.

Hezbollah, which the United States considers a terrorist organization, has been one of the staunchest opponents of U.S. policy in the Middle East and a sworn enemy of Israel. It fought Israel in southern Lebanon in 2006 in a devastating war and has tried to smuggle weapons to the Palestinian group Hamas in Gaza through Egypt.

Hezbollah will still rule

Analysis

The victory of Lebanon's western-backed 14 March alliance in Sunday's elections essentially signifies the victory of sensible Lebanon, a state keen on ensuring its sovereignty and keeping distance from the long arm of Syria and Iran.

The moderate alliance made some impressive achievements during this election (like winning all seven seats in Zahle region, an opposition stronghold), but before we begin hailing a new chapter in Middle East politics, we should bear in mind that very little will change in Lebanon.

The White House will not even waste its time with attributing the results to President Barack Obama's foreign policy overtures. The victory of 14 March is far from overwhelming – initial results show that it won 68 seats in parliament, compared to 70 in the previous elections.

Lebanon is likely to remain a deeply divided country, overridden by regional powers, election results aside.

For the duration of their next term in power, Prime Minister Fuad Siniora's cabinet and majority leader Saad Hariri's coalition will be dependent on Hezbollah's goodwill. With last summer's violent showdown between Hezbollah and its supporters and pro-western demonstrators, Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah made absolutely clear who is in charge.

Maybe that's why during his victory speech, Hariri extended his hand to the defeated opposition, and gave his blessing to "everyone who voted for the rival parties."

The pro-western camp will seek to stay away from confrontation and will probably refrain from asking Hezbollah to disarm.

Israel, meanwhile, must continue to strike a delicate balance in its dealings with Lebanon, a country ruled in practice by a terror group while its government enjoys overarching U.S. support.

Hezbollah will undoubtedly protest alleged electoral fraud and fabrications, and blame the "unfavourable" election system. They may be right about the system, but it didn't stop short of bribing voters either.

But it's time Hezbollah draws the necessary conclusions from these elections results. In the 1996 elections, the organization lost 25 per cent of its power in parliament, which was seen by commentators as expressing voters' dismay at its provoking Israel into retaliating with Operation Accountability in 1993 and Operation Grapes of Wrath in 1996.

Hezbollah's hopes that standing up to Israel will translate into political gains turned out to be unfounded. "God's victory," the name it gave the Second Lebanon War, didn't make it to the polls.

"We must reject the false comfort of the belief that others' suffering is not our problem," he continued.

Wiesel later echoed this sentiment, saying that he was not convinced that the world had learned the lesson of the Holocaust, because if it had, the atrocities in Rwanda, Cambodia and Bosnia would not have been allowed to happen.

"This place teaches us that we must be ever vigilant about the spread of evil in our own time," Obama said.

Israeli gov't hopes Obama's Cairo speech heralds new era

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli government praised U.S. President Barack Obama's speech to the Muslim world last Thursday, saying it shared his hopes for Middle East peace, but stressed that Israel's security interests remained paramount.

"We share President Obama's hope that the American effort heralds the opening of a new era that will bring an end to the conflict and to general Arab recognition of Israel as the nation of the Jewish people that lives in security and peace in the Middle East," an official statement said after Obama's address in Cairo.

The statement made no mention of settlements, which Obama said should not be expanded, nor Palestinian statehood.

At odds with Obama, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has said that construction would continue in existing settlements in the West Bank and he has not publicly endorsed a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Netanyahu's bureau also released a statement last Thursday affirming Israel's desire to pursue peace, but in accordance with its national interests.

"Israel is committed to peace and will do all it can to expand the circle of peace while considering its national interests, first and foremost being security," the statement said.

Later Thursday, Defence Minster Ehud Barak echoed the comments in welcoming Obama's address and reiterated Israel's desire to pursue peace talks.

"In the speech there is reinforcement and encouragement for moderate elements and supporters of peace. There is also outspoken criticism of terrorism and [its] origins of violence and extremism that are threatening the stability of our region and the entire world," said Barak in a statement.

He added that Israel lauded Obama's commitment to its existence and security, and his calls for the country's integration in the Middle East.

"Israel is committed to advancing negotiations with the Palestinians, based on agreements that have previously been committed to," he said. "We hope that the Arab world will heed the calls of President Obama to put an end to terror and violence and forge peaceful relations with Israel."

Earlier in the day, Daniel Hershkowitz, chairman of the rightist Habayit Hayehudi party, said that Obama ignored the fact that the Palestinians have yet to renounce terror.

"The Israeli government is not an American surplus," he said during a tour of Hebron. "Our relations are based on friendship, not domination, and we've got to draw a line when it comes to natural growth in the settlements."

Kadima Knesset member Ze'ev Boim said that "Obama's speech is yet another proof that Netanyahu miscalculated the foreign policy of the new American administration."

"The president's take on the Palestinian question is similar to Kadima's, and it's a shame that narrow political considerations prevented the Israeli government from espousing the two-state solution, which is the only one that can ensure a Jewish and democratic existence in Israel."

Kadima MK Yohanan Plesner said that "Israel could benefit from the America's improved image in the Arab world and leverage it to forge a regional coalition, together with the moderate Arab countries, to counter Iran, but instead the government is engaged in marginal debates on outposts."

Minority Affairs Minister Avishay Braverman (Labor) said that Obama was right that the world's common enemy is extremism and that finding a common strategy is the way to defeat it.

"We should adopt a similar strategy in Jewish-Arab and religious-secular relations, as well as vis-a-vis the Palestinians," Braverman said. "We are committed to the two-state solution."

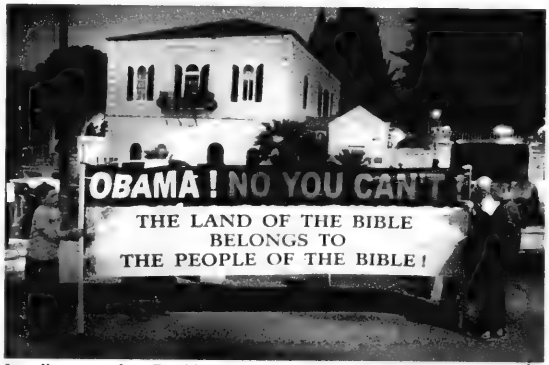
Meretz leader Haim Oron, for his part, welcomed Obama's speech. He said it was filled with inspiration, optimism and vision.

"The speech is the feat of enlightenment," he said.

An Israeli settler spokesperson dismissed Obama's speech in Cairo as naive and out of touch with reality.

Aliza Herbst, a resident of the Ofra settlement, said modern history has shown that the Muslim world is at war with the West. She added that Obama's vision of peace sounded nice but was not realistic.

President Shimon Peres praised Obama's Mideast speech as a historic opportunity in a guest column in the Times.



Israelis opposed to President Obama's policies demonstrate outside the American consulate in Jerusalem. [Flash 90 photo]

Obama's journey to Saudi Arabia and Egypt, Peres wrote, "reflects both the need for an historic change in the Middle East and a unique chance of achieving it."

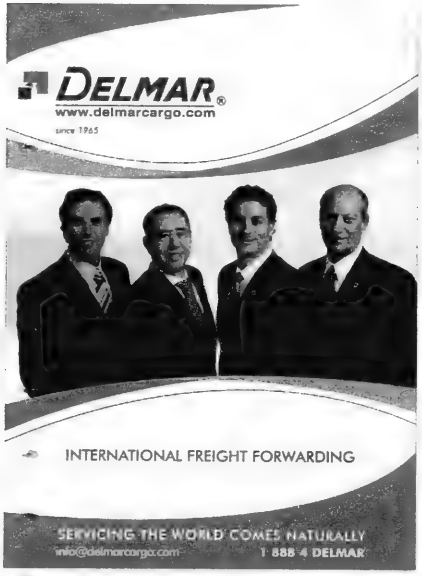
Peres said that the international options that are being discussed – the Saudi peace initiative as well as the so-called "57-state solution" proposed by King Abdullah of Jordan – could create a favourable momentum that would lead to the resolution of the Israeli-Arab conflict.

He called on Arab countries to engage in bilateral negotiations with Israel while espousing a regional process of normalization.

"Support from the entire Arab world will provide legitimacy for the Palestinian Authority as it approaches the difficult task of making and then implementing historic compromises. At the same time, it may reassure Israel that the painful concessions it will make will be rewarded by a broader, more enduring comprehensive peace across the region," Peres wrote.

Peres said Obama's fervent commitment to changing American foreign policy in the Middle East is a rare opportunity.

"The regional leaders have to treat these options seriously – not as another photo opportunity but in a substantive discussion aimed at opening the door towards comprehensive peace and regional economic development," he said.



Palestinians must work too

JTA

BERLIN — U.S. President Barack Obama emphasized that he expects the Palestinians to live up to their commitments.

A day after his speech to the Muslim world in Cairo, Obama addressed what he said was the abundance of attention paid to his demands of Israel in advancing the peace process.

"What's been interesting is that less attention has been focused on the insistence on my part that the Palestinians and the Arab states have to take very concrete actions," Obama said in Germany before touring the Buchenwald concentration camp and Dresden, a city levelled by the Allies toward the end of World War II.

"When it comes to the Palestinians, we know what they're supposed to be doing. They have to continue to make progress on security in the West Bank. They have to deal with incitement issues. There's still a tendency, even… among Palestinians who say they are interested in peace with Israel, to engage in statements that… incite a hatred of Israel or are not constructive to the peace process."

Obama credited Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, with progress "but not enough. We still have not seen a firm commitment from the Palestinian Authority that they can control some of the border areas that Israel is going to be very concerned about if there were to be a two-state solution. There are still problems of corruption and mismanagement within the Authority that have to be addressed."

If the issues are not addressed, "Israelis are going to have trouble moving forward," Obama said.

Obama's remarks implied a rebuke of Abbas who, subsequent to his meeting with Obama last month, said that he won't fulfil his obligations until Israel freezes settlements.

In his Cairo speech, Obama said he expected Israel to freeze West Bank settlement, to facilitate movement for Palestinians, and to allow more humanitarian assistance to reach the Gaza Strip, where the Hamas terrorist group is in control.

Obama, Israel and Iran

Israeli press reported that a senior Iranian ayatollah said that the United States must change its policies toward Israel to improve ties with Iran. "Whatever the U.S. president says about forgetting the past and starting a new phase of relations with Iran, the first condition should be a policy change toward Israel," Ayatollah Ahmad Jannati said at Friday prayers in Tehran. The ayatollah was referring to U.S. President Barack Obama's speech to the Muslim world Thursday in Cairo, in which he said instead of remaining trapped in the past, the United States was prepared to move forward in its relations with the Islamic republic. "The problems we have with the U.S. are fundamental and not minor ones," said Jannati, the head of the senate-like Guardian Council. "Israel is one of the fundamental issues, and the question is what you – Obama – want to do with Israel. If you continue the support, then there will be the same old story again," added the ayatollah, who is prominent in the country's hard-line faction and close to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Schalit talks resume?

Indirect talks have resumed for the release of Gilad Schalit, an Arab newspaper reported. A top Hamas leader visited Cairo to continue the negotiations for the release of the kidnapped Israeli soldier, the London-based Al Hayat reported Thursday. Schalit was captured in June 2006 in a cross-border attack from Gaza. Former Mossad senior operative Haggai Hadas was named chief negotiator in the Schalit case Sunday, and met with the Schalit family the following day.

PA kills Hamas operatives

Palestinian police killed two Hamas militants last Thursday after the men opened fire at security forces that had surrounded their underground hideout, Palestinian officials said. One officer was also killed in the operation, part of an intensifying crackdown on Islamic militants in the West Bank.

Death threats to top general

Israel's top army general in charge of the West Bank, Maj-Gen. Gadi Shamni, has received letters containing death threats. "You are tainted with anti-Semitism and hatred of real Jews," one letter read. "We will know how to get to you and your children will see their father for the Satan he is," read the letter, which also threatened Shamni's family. The writers refer to themselves as the Orange Ones, and say they will not evacuate settlements. Shamni's home has been the site of settler protests, Ha'aretz reported. His car's tires were slashed recently in his driveway.

Olmert's surgery a success

Former prime minister Ehud Olmert underwent surgery in the United States to remove a cancerous growth from his prostate. Physicians at the Weill Cornell Medical College in New York state said the operation was successful and there were no complications. »

Iran goes to the polls

Analysis

For several years, Israel and pro-Israel groups have been holding up Iran's president as a would-be Adolf Hitler. But with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad uncertain to win his re-election bid June 12, the question arises of whether they would be worse off if they didn't have the Holocaust-denying leader to kick around anymore.

Ahmadinejad's main challenger is Mir-Hossein Mousavi, a one-time hardliner who was prime minister during the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s and who since has evolved into a western-looking moderate.

Mousavi, whose chances in the June 12 election have been buoyed by a faltering economy, seems to be saying the right things. Denying the Holocaust, he has argued, is counterproductive and dishonours the Jewish dead. He also wants to negotiate peaceful relations with the United States, although not at the expense of Iran's nuclear program.

The problem from the perspective of some pro-Israel groups is that saying the right things is meaningless so long as Iran remains committed to acquiring game-changing nuclear weapons capability. More than that, they worry, it could be dangerous if the election of a relative moderate such as Mousavi undercuts efforts by Israel to make the case that dealing with Iran's nuclear program is urgent. Any amount of time the West gives Mousavi, if he wins, to consolidate his moderation in the Iranian establishment, according to this thinking, is time Iran will use to develop the bomb – something that Israel believes could happen within a year.

"Cynics would say: maybe we're better with Ahmadinejad, rather than someone who is a master of PR who still believes Israel should be wiped from the map," said Abraham Foxman, the national director of the Anti-Defamation League (ADL). Nonetheless, Foxman said, he'd rather see Ahmadinejad and his poisonous rhetoric gone. "Anyone would be better than Ahmadinejad," he said.

Still, the message flooding in-boxes in recent weeks – from groups like the ADL, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, as well as the Israeli Foreign Ministry – is that whoever wins the election, the strings remain in the hands of Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's spiritual leader and highest authority.

Israel's Foreign Ministry has, according to a report in Ha'aretz, ordered an intensification of protests and information briefings ahead of Iran's elections, "to show the world that Iran is not a western democracy," according to a ministry official not named by the newspaper.

Israeli shorts are offered at the Worldwide Short Film Festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The 15th annual Worldwide Short Film Festival runs from June 16 to 21, and among its many offerings are two films from Israel.

Wind Chimes, a 19-minute feature by Orr Schulman, deals with the always distressing topic of mental illness.

Orit Lerner is in the shower when her grown daughter, Lia, calls yet again. Lia threatens to jump out of the window unless her mother brings her a falafel immediately. "Mom, please help me," she implores.

Orit has been through this drill before, but she can't say no to an unbalanced daughter who may harm herself.

So she and her husband, Avi, comply with Lia's outlandish request. As they drive to her house with a freshly bought falafel, there is a flashback concerning Lia's youth in which she goes wild when her mother refuses to comb out her long, flowing hair.

Being a practical person, Avi suggests that Lia should be hospitalized. Orit won't hear of it, but Lia weighs heavily on her.

When the Lerners arrive, Lia is gone. What else is new? What to do?

Wind Chimes, in its precise and empathetic way, explores the sorrows and frustrations of parents tossed and turned by events beyond their control.

It will be screened, along with a few other shorts, at the Cumberland 4 Cinema, 159 Cumberland Street, on Thursday, June 18 from 2 p.m. onward.

***

What About Me? satirizes Israel's system of checkpoints in the West Bank, which greatly restricts the movements of its Palestinian inhabitants.

The five-minute film, by Shira Geffen and Etgar Keret, unfolds in a desert wasteland. As a lone soldier guards a checkpoint in the middle of nowhere, an Arab man in a suit, leading a donkey, approaches.

The soldier allows the beast, carrying a load of bananas, to pass through the barrier. Strangely enough, he refuses to let the owner through as well.

The man sits down on the sand to eat a banana. The soldier joins him.

"Do you have another banana?" he asks.

"The donkey took them," he replies.

In simple strokes, What About Me? demolishes the logic of a system that controls the lives of Palestinians. It's simplistic, of course, since Israel's security problems cannot be sloughed off. Yet a point has been made.

What About Me? and several other shorts will be screened at the Cumberland 4 on Sunday, June 21 from 9:15 p.m. onward.

What about Me? and Wind Chimes are Israeli films playing at the Worldwide Short Film Festival.

Book profiles Canadian business and cultural leaders

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

If you could sit down with a group of immensely successful business and cultural leaders for an inspirational, advice-filled chat, who would you choose?

How about Issy Sharp, the legendary founder of the Four Season hotel empire?

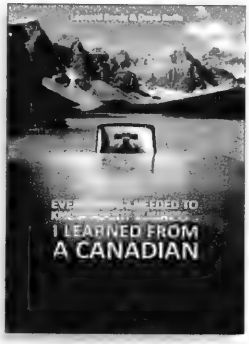
While these real-life characters aren't likely going to join you in person any time soon, their fascinating insights, experiences and lessons learned are candidly shared in Everything I Needed to Know About Business… I Learned from a Canadian, by David Raffa and Leonard Brody.

"Historically, we [Canadians] have been bad at telling our own stories, yet we are actually doing some amazing things," says co-author and prolific entrepreneur in his own right, Leonard Brody.

"This is a business reader's book that builds the Canadian brand."

More than 20 people who have achieved excellence in a diverse array of fields are featured in the book's second edition, including such well-known successes as CEO of CanWest Leonard Asper and child rights' advocate Craig Kielburger, to lesser known champions as Craig Dobbin, founder of the world's largest helicopter company, CHC Helicopter Corp., and Joel Cohen, producer of The Simpsons.

The book provides a brief but comprehensive profile on each subject and includes their tips, wisdom and a key section in each chapter titled "5 Things You Need to Know."



"If I wanted to invite some of the best people in business over for dinner, there would be a disproportionate number of Canadians," says Brody, who is also co-founder and CEO of NowPublic, one of the fastest-growing news agencies in the world, with more than 170,000 contributing reporters and over three million readers per month.

"If I wanted to know about customer service, I'd talk to Issy Sharp – he redefined the luxury brand. If I wanted to learn how to innovate in an industry that's declining, I'd talk to Terry McBride [the founder and CEO of the Canadian music label and band management firm Nettwerk Music Group]."

A significant number of the profilees in the book are Jewish, a fact Brody notes isn't surprising.

"The Jewish community has such as strong communal element, with amazing kinship between entrepreneurs," says Brody, who was raised in Calgary and now lives in Vancouver.

"It began with people coming to the country as immigrants and having to develop an incredible work ethic."

Brody himself did not grow up in a wealthy family and says his entrepreneurialism stems from a staunch desire to channel his own ideas into action.

"I was motivated by wanting to control my own destiny," says Brody, 37.

"I'm an ideas guy and when you have that personality, you're likely to excel as an entrepreneur."

Everything I Needed to Know is an engaging read with practical advice from people who know what they're talking about.

Everything from fostering teamwork and innovative marketing to managing change and even how to sell your company is articulated in a reader-friendly fashion.

As Scott White of the Canadian Press says, "Brody and Raffa… offer valuable lessons on how to harness teamwork, creativity and – above all – passion into any workplace."

"Have you lost your mind?" Megan shrieked into the phone after I told her about Jacob's summer plans. My friend did not attempt to hide her disapproval which was heightened when I told her three orthodox Jewish teenagers would be responsible for his well-being. Maybe I did lose it, I'm not sure. And I started doubting my parental abilities, again. Jacob, my son, has Pelizaeus-Merzbacher Disease (PMD) a degenerative neurological disorder that prevents him from sitting by himself, walking, talking and swallowing. It does not, however, impair his ability to understand conversations or affect his amazing sense of humour.

Nice Jewish Girls hit the road

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Bubbies watch out! If you're still trying to find your grandson a nice Jewish girl to settle down with, five of them are coming to Ontario this week.

Except these girls are known for deconstructing years of tradition, expectations and guilt, in a fast-paced vaudeville extravaganza.

"It's a lot of fun," says Susannah Perlman, the ringleader of Nice Jewish Girls Gone Bad, a New York-based troupe.

She says the show is a combination burlesque, comedy, musical, variety show. "Then there's this Jewish thing that keeps it together."

It's been described as a night of comedy told by girls who learned to smoke at Hebrew school and got drunk at their bat mitzvahs.

"People relate to this show in many ways," she says. "We've been told it's pretty edgy." Part of the show has the group taking traditional Jewish songs and giving them a humorous, modern twist. "For instance, we do a surf version of Hava Nagila."

Perlman is a comedian/chanteuse who has performed across America and was featured on the TV show Last Comic Standing.

Nice Jewish Girls Gone Bad started six years as an event for the American magazine Heeb. It was reformatted two years and was successful during a run off-Broadway. It has since toured across America.

A night of comedy

"We are now hitting every place where we haven't been before," Perlman says.

The Girls play the Rivoli in Toronto on June 11 and 12 (416-597-0794), Modern Fuel in Kingston on June 13 (613-548-4883) and Zaphod Beeblebrox in Ottawa on June 14 (613-562-1010). Tickets can be purchased at www.brownpapertickets.com. Visit the Girls' website at www.nicejewishgirlsgonebad.com.

POET SEYMOUR MAYNE FETED IN ISRAEL AS NEW COLLECTION PUBLISHED IN HEBREW

Ottawa professor-poet Seymour Mayne is in Israel for the launch of Selected Poems, a major collection of his poems in Hebrew translation. The translator is Moshe Dor, the senior Israeli poet and man of letters, and the publisher is Keshev Le'Shira, a major Israel publisher of poetry.

While in Israel, Mayne is delivering a lecture on his friend, the late poet Irving Layton, and giving a reading at Tel Aviv University for the department of English and the creative writing program. He is also being honoured by four leading Israeli poets – Raquel Chalfi, Amir Or, Karen Alkalay-Gut and Rafi Weichert – who are to read his poems in Hebrew as he recites the English originals in a gallery in the trendy Newe Tzedeq district of Tel Aviv.

He is also scheduled as a guest speaker at a gathering of the Voices Israel Association, an English-language group of Israeli writers. The Canadian Ambassador is hosting a reception in his honour on June 17 to celebrate the publication of the new poetry collection. The volume is Mayne's fifth and most substantial work to be published in Hebrew, and underlines the strong connection of his poetry to Israel.

New Poetry Volume: Speaking of poets, 28-year-old Brandon Marlon, winner of the 2007 Canadian Jewish Playwriting Competition, recently published a new collection of poetry titled Inspirations of Israel: Poetry for a Land and People. The work is "a lyrical tribute to the epic saga that is Israel" and suffused with spirituality.

Marlon, who comes from an observant Jewish home, now lives in Jerusalem. A graduate of the University of Toronto in drama, he has also written numerous screen and stage plays on historic and modern Jewish themes. The new book is available from Xlibris Corporation. www.xlibris.com

Wrecking Ball Party: Join the Koffler Gallery of the Arts in bidding farewell to its famous curved walls and other kooky spaces as it prepares for a bold future in a new state-of-the-art facility. Its Wrecking Ball party features artists Isaac Applebaum, Carmelo Arnoldin, Barbara Astman, Blue Republic, Stephen Cruise, Lynn Fisher, Simon Frank, Karilee Fuglem, Rafael Goldchain, Sadko Hadzihasanovic, David Kaufman, Andrew Moore, Joshua Neustein, Ed Pien, Cyril Reade, Rochelle Rubinstein, Judith Schwartz, Brian Smith, Evan Tapper, Denyse Thomasos and Akira Yoshikawa.

The event features unique installations by artists who have formerly exhibited at the Koffler, on view for one night only. Patrons may also enjoy the exhibition Russia: Beyond Utopia by photographer Andrew Moore, as well as a silent art auction, construction-themed cocktails, demolition-inspired desserts, eclectic entertainment and art on the spot. Tickets are $50 in advance, $65 at the door, $250 with VIP reception. Thursday, June 18, 8 p.m. 4588 Bathurst St. www.kofflerarts.org, www.ticketweb.ca

Defiance out on DVD

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Defiance, Edward Zwick's film about the Bielski brothers who led a Jewish partisan group in the forests of Belarus during the Holocaust, is now available on DVD.

The film stars Daniel Craig as Tuvia, the eldest of the three brothers, who heroically leads a ragged band of Jews escaping the Nazis into the forest. The group became known as the "Otriad" ("the revenged"), and provided food and shelter for the refugees they were protecting.

The DVD contains an informative commentary soundtrack by director Zwick, as well as several other "making of" features. The best one is a 15-minute documentary, Children of the Otriad, in which the Bielskis' children and grandchildren talk about the memories they have of the brothers. This documentary also includes interesting clips of the Bielski family's home movies and follows them on a moving journey to the forests of Belarus.

Sisters launch Hadassah chapter to continue their grandmother's work

By RIVA GOLD
Special to The CJN

Most people wouldn't combine teddy bears, poker, and brisket lessons with charity work for Israel. Then again, most people aren't Leah Seetner-Goldband and Heidi Seetner-Czutrin, the founders of a new Hadassah chapter in Toronto called Yafah.

Yafah, named after the Hebrew word for beauty, was created last June so that women aged 27 to 32 could help implement Hadassah's vision.

"The women in our chapter are beautiful inside and out, and we wanted the name to reflect that," Seetner-Goldband says.

Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW) is a women's philanthropic organization that supports women, children, and health care in Canada and Israel.

Seetner-Goldband, 30, and Seetner-Czutrin, 28, were inspired to create the chapter after their grandmother, Ilse Seetner, was honoured by Hadassah with a star for her lifetime commitment to the organization.

"If you say 'Seetner' at any Hadassah chapter, every person in the room will know our grandmother," Seetner-Czutrin says.

Her grandmother joined CHW with her mother when they came to Canada from Germany after World War II, and her grandmother served as president in 1979. She was particularly committed to Hadassah's Rose Dunkleman Daycare, and travelled to Israel to help build it.

"When we went for the star dedication ceremony, someone told us stories about our grandmother's involvement," says Seetner-Czutrin.

"We'd never heard about her work before, and we were so inspired."

The sisters wanted to make sure the next generation of women would be there to support causes like the daycare centre.

"That kind of project really hits home with women our age who may have growing families," says Seetner-Goldband.

"It's incredible to be able to help Jewish women just like ourselves."

They felt that their generation wasn't taking advantage of these opportunities, and decided to start their own chapter.

The Yafah chapter recently launched the Baby Bear Project, which sells two types of stuffed bears to raise funds for Hadassah. About 350 bears have been sold so far, often serving as centrepieces at baby-namings and brit milahs.

The chapter's next fundraiser will be a poker tournament this September. "We're sort of in the early planning stage... It's really hard to organize," says Seetner-Czutrin.

While charity work is central to the chapter, Yafah's monthly meetings are meant to be entertaining. For their next meeting, a nutritionist is coming to talk about how to maintain healthy lifestyles for young families.

"Meetings are social more than anything," says Seetner-Goldband, adding that many women her age are too busy to spend any time on themselves.

> "There's definitely a feeling of sisterhood."

"Once a month, we leave all our responsibilities at home," her sister added. "We have snacks, meet great women, and still get the fulfillment of doing charity."

Meetings have taken on a variety of themes from Chanukah card-making sessions to kosher cooking classes.

"A chef taught us to make brisket – it was amazing," Seetner-Goldband says.

Yafah members gathered at one of the meetings last Chaunkah to make Chanukah greeting cards.

"We're considering having a real estate agent come in and talk about buying homes," Seetner-Czutrin added. "We also might play Guitar Hero for a whole meeting, or do yoga."

Creating the chapter was surprisingly easy for the sisters, who recruited primarily online.

"We sent out a massive e-invite to every young Jewish woman we'd ever met," jokes Seetner-Czutrin.

"There are several people who joined that I had never met before, or hadn't seen in 15 years," she says, adding that through Yafah, they reconnected with a number of their former classmates from United Synagogue Day School and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and have a membership of about 70 women.

"There's definitely a feeling of sisterhood," says Seetner-Czutrin.

For these sisters from North York, working together is nothing new. The two also work full time for their parents' business, which manufactures and imports plush toys.

Yafah members raised more than $4,000 selling these teddy bears at last year's Hadassah Bazaar to support needy women and children in Canada and Israel.

Working in the toy business has been very useful for the pair, who have been able to get discounted rates on the toys they sell for Yafah.

When the young Yafah chapter set up a booth at last year's Hadassah Bazaar to sell their stuffed teddy bears, the women raised more than $4,000.

A child survivor undergoes therapy in Wiesel's new novel

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Elie Wiesel's latest novel, A Mad Desire to Dance, is a return to his storytelling roots and to themes familiar to his readers.

Although not directly a Holocaust novel, its protagonist is a child survivor who spent the war years hiding with his father in a barn in a town in Poland "too small for the Nazis to bother with."

The narrator is Doriel, a 60-ish bachelor who believes he is mad and haunted by a dybbuk. But you wonder whether he is really mad – or simply wants to be mad. Often you get the impression he enjoys acting mad. Doriel also has a number of other problems – anxiety, inability to be intimate with women, and survivor's guilt.

He is apparently very wealthy (he never tells us till the end how he obtained his wealth) and visits an expensive Manhattan therapist to get to the source of his problems.

The large part of this novel takes place in his therapist's office – the plot mostly unfolding as conversation with her (and as letters to his dead parents). From the outset, he warns his therapist, and the reader, the narrative will not be chronological and jumps all over the place.

"You have to be be abnormal if you want to live normally in the hell of man," he tells his therapist, who like a good Freudian shrink explores his relationship with his mother and with women.

While he and his father were hiding during the war, his mother used her Aryan looks to join the Polish resistance. Throughout his therapy, Doriel drops hints that she may have had an affair with another resistance fighter. His parents, after surviving the war, died in a car crash in Paris. His two siblings died in the Holocaust.

He is raised by his religious uncle in New York, and when he grows up, he attends a yeshiva in Israel. However, he begins to question his faith. "Against a world invaded by madness, should we use the faith of our ancestors, or our own madness?" he asks. Here, the reader finds himself deep in familiar Wiesel territory.

Doriel becomes a lone wanderer, following a path that leads to nowhere. He is a tough patient for his therapist – also a child of survivors – probably because he is well educated and clever. Much of his therapy sessions consist of games he plays with his therapist.

This makes him an annoying character. The reader just wants to hit him on the head sometimes to snap him out of it. But he must be likable enough as, unbelievably at times, women seem to be attracted to him, even when they're less than half his age.

Sometimes A Mad Desire to Dance (Knopf), translated from the French by Catherine Temerson, gets weighted down in its own psychobabble and sometimes the narrative, like Doriel, wanders around aimlessly. Many questions are asked but never answered, many narrative threads begun, but never completed.

Yet, in the end, this book is like therapy. Avenues are explored, ideas prodded, journeys started but never completed. But this is a Wiesel novel, after all, and a patient reader will be rewarded.

Novel introduces Mideast conflict to teens

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

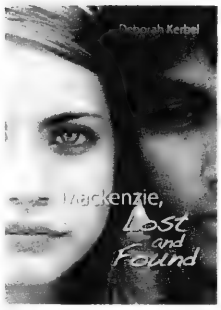
Young adult novelist Deborah Kerbel hopes that her book about love, loss and adventure in Jerusalem will help introduce aspects of the Middle East conflict to North American teens.

Mackenzie, Lost and Found, published by Dundurn Press, is about a 15-year-old Torontonian who reluctantly moves to Jerusalem with her father – who takes a job as a visiting archeology professor at Hebrew University – following the death of her mother a year before.

In addition to trying to fit into a foreign city, and dealing with a tragic death, Mackenzie, who is Christian, finds herself in a secret, forbidden romance with a Palestinian Muslim boy and unwittingly becomes dangerously involved in an illegal antiquities trading ring.

The book also touches on some of the complexities of the Arab-Israeli conflict, such as terrorism, rights to land, cultural differences and religious issues.

"There is a lot there, and sometimes I wonder if I tried to put too much into one book… I think the themes there are pretty universal – forbidden love, coming of age, a struggle to fit in – all these things are things that kids can relate to," said Kerbel.



"I'd never seen a YA novel set in the Middle East before. I knew it would be challenging, but I thought it would be a great way to introduce a very complex topic to a teenage audience in an accessible way."

She said that people in North America are bombarded with news about the Middle East, but few are truly informed about all the complexities of the region.

"Maybe after reading this story, next time a teenager sees a story about Israel, maybe they won't just look the other way, maybe they will feel more connected to the country and the people. That's what I hope."

Kerbel, who has been writing fiction for the past 10 years, said the inspiration for Mackenzie, Lost and Found came from a friend's childhood experience.

She said she was eight months pregnant and eager to get a book started before the baby was born, when she met with a friend for lunch.

"I mentioned to my friend that I was looking for a book idea, and she immediately said, 'Well, why don't you expand on what happened to me? When I was 15, my parents moved the family from Canada to Israel and it changed my life,'" Kerbel recalled.

"That really got the wheels in my head turning, and I got home and I started thinking about the premise and what I could do to a character who was put in that situation. I started writing about all the possibilities of what could happen. I had an outline and probably a chapter or two done by the time my daughter was born."

Now, with two young children, Kerbel said she works on her writing whenever she has a chance.

By the end of this year, Kerbel is preparing to release another YA novel titled Girl on the Other Side.

"This is about two girls who exist on opposite sides of their school social ladder. There is one girl who seems to have the perfect life, and the other girl is the constant target of school bullies. The book explores the idea of what happens when their lives come crashing together," she said.

Kerbel said she loves to write about children and young adults because their experiences are new and emotions are high.

"I also think it's a great way to stay connected to your young side. Writing for kids, speaking with kids and interacting with them, talking about the books helps to keep me young."

Karate blackbelt, 14, heading to Maccabiah Games

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN
CJN Intern

Samantha Krystantos has trained in karate since she was just four years old. Now 14, she's set to put her skills to the test against international competition at the 18th Maccabiah Games.

Krystantos received her first black belt when she was nine and earned her second-degree black belt just two years later. For the past two years, she's divided her time between working toward her third-degree black belt – there are 10 in all – and teaching part-time at Northern Karate School Thornhill as a sensei, or master.

To balance school work and her extracurricular activities, including dance lessons, the eighth grader has to be fairly disciplined with her time.

Then again, as a sensei, discipline comes with the territory.

"It's pretty hard," she admitted, "because I also have homework and next year I'm going to be in high school, so I have a lot of projects and exams I have to study for. But I try to make time for it."

Krystantos teaches classes twice a week and also takes classes with both master-level kids ages four to 17 and adults.

As someone who instructs both adults and children, Krystantos has had to find ways to accommodate the needs of both age groups.

"Sometimes with little kids, it's hard for them to focus," she explained. "You have to try and get them to listen to you. But we try to treat the younger kids the same as the adults, so we push them just as much."

As with any martial art, karate requires one to be both physically and psychologically focused, both when sparring with opponents and especially when teaching others.

Fortunately, Krystantos has an innate ability to concentrate on the task at hand.

"Whenever she's up there, she just blocks everything out," her father, Mitchell, said.

He also takes classes at Northern Karate and is currently on his advanced blue belt. His sensei, strangely enough, is his daughter, and in case you think there's any familiar father-daughter interplay during lessons, Mitchell said that's simply not the case.

"When we're in the dojo [training area], she puts me on the ground," he said matter-of-factly.

"She makes me work for it… At home, she's my daughter, but in the dojo, she's 'Sensei Sam' and she'll have me doing pushups. It's the only time she actually gets to punish me."

Although karate is primarily a discipline first and a combat sport second, Krystantos said her training has developed her reflexes and senses to the point that she would have no problem defending herself outside the dojo, even against a much larger person.

"Karate teaches you a lot of things, like how to get out of situations… So, if somebody on the street came to grab me, I would know what to do."

Samantha Krystantos

People are generally surprised to learn this lithe teen is not only a participant in the Maccabiah Games, but that she's a competitor in the karate tournament. As might be expected, she's seen her fair share of amazed reactions.

"When I tell people I'm going to the Maccabiah Games, they're like 'Oh cool, for gymnastics?' and I'm like, 'No, for karate.' People don't really expect a girl at 14 to be into karate," she said.

Krystantos – her family takes its name from her father Mitchell's stepfather – is looking forward to her first visit to Israel to celebrate her Jewish heritage and see the famous sights on a tour that's organized for the athletes.

"All my friends are Jewish, and I just feel really excited to go there for my first time… People tell me it's such an amazing experience," she said.

It costs $7,500 to send an athlete to the games, and the Krystantos family has been actively raising funds for Samantha and her teammates to help cover a portion of the cost. They've organized a Spar-a-Thon involving members of Northern Karate and their friends, as well as upcoming event at the Promenade Mall on June 13, and they've solicited donations at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Walk With Israel .

"It's a team effort," Mitchell said. "There are some people on the team that just don't have the luxury we have, and we're trying to get them [support], too."

Ref's 45-year career recognized

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Johnny Elias walked into the room bearing plaques and certificates, so you knew he was also bearing bragging rights about something.

One of Montreal's best-known baseball figures, Elias had basketball on his mind this day.

The 69-year-old had recently been recognized by two organizations – the Florida High School Athletics Association and the Metropolitan Montreal Basketball Referees Association – for his 45 years of officiating as a referee.

"It's something I'm really proud of," said Elias, who also came with a fistful of photographs of some of the greatest names in baseball – all friends he still corresponds and hobnobs with while wintering in Florida.

Bill "Spaceman" Lee, Jim Bouton, Gary Carter, Stab Bahnsen, Tim Raines, Andre Dawson, Warren Cromartie, Dave Cash, Dennis Martinez, Ron Swoboda – you name them, and Elias has a ready anecdote, as well as photos to go along with it.

As far as basketball is concerned, the job of referee was something Elias sort of fell into years ago at Springfield College, known by some as the "birthplace of basketball."

Elias was asked to ref a game and it fit him perfectly. "Within three years, I was doing college ball," he said.

Elias is considered one of the most reliable basketball referees in the business, officiating at college games in the United States and Canada until the 1990s, when he began to ref only high school and senior men's basketball.

Elias also travelled to Israel several times to officiate in both baseball and basketball. He was assistant basketball coach when the Canadian basketball team won gold at the Maccabiah Games in 1997, and helped run the Canadian baseball team that took silver in 2005.

"I take it a year at a time," Elias said, referring to his high school and senior men's basketball activities these days. "If my health holds up, if I can still be mentally into the games, that's the important thing," he said.

If the game is an obvious rout, it's not necessarily much fun, "but if the game is very competitive, you naturally get into it much more."

The play isn't the problem

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

On May 14, Paul Michaels, writing in his weekly CJN column, discussed CBC Radio's airing of Caryl Churchill's controversial play, Seven Jewish Children. He opened with the following warning: "Criticism of Israel is reaching a state of hysterical overreaction, devoid of rational analysis of events on the ground."

Michaels went on to quote from the final, highly emotional act of Seven Jewish Children. "Tell her we killed the babies by mistake…Tell her I laughed when I saw the dead policemen. Tell her they're animals living in rubble now. Tell her I wouldn't care if we wiped them out… Tell her we're better haters. Tell her we're chosen people."

This sounds pretty bad. Churchill would appear to be portraying Israelis as ruthless, unsympathetic killers – she may even be invoking the notorious blood libel. Except…

Well, except that Michaels curiously left out the last part of the quote. Those words are: "Don't tell her that. Tell her we love her. Don't frighten her."

Now, that makes the whole thing sound quite different, doesn't it? The speaker, a Jewish parent pondering how to explain the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to a child, rescinds her earlier diatribe – what else can the words "Don't tell her that" mean? The parent displayed anger at the Palestinians – and who can blame him or her, after the incessant rocket attacks, suicide bombings and treachery of the Palestinian leadership? – and even a hunger for vengeance. But cooler heads prevailed: the parent realized that anger and violence won't help anyone, most certainly not the younger generation of Israelis.

Seven Jewish Children, is perhaps the most rational encounter with the frail psyche of an Israeli parent that I have ever seen. But you wouldn't know that from reading the hypersensitive, paranoid bluster of Jewish leaders.

And Michaels, in my opinion, was guilty of bowdlerizing yours truly much as he did Churchill. In his May 28 CJN column, he discussed a piece I had written a week earlier in the National Post about Seven Jewish Children, wherein I argued, as I just have above, that the play is not the anti-Semitic diatribe that many commentators in the Jewish community have made it out to be.

Michaels quoted me as writing, "The worst one can say about Seven Jewish Children is that it makes a link between the Holocaust perpetrated against the Jews, and another, newer, genocide of the Palestinians perpetrated by Israel." Then he laid it on thick: "What is worse than implying that Israelis are acting like Nazis?" he asked. "There is nothing 'nuanced' about this absurd allegation, which means any claim that the play is a 'nuanced piece of writing' shouldn't be taken seriously."

He's right: How could I have been so ho-hum about a play that links the Holocaust and what the far-left has dubbed the genocide of the Palestinians? Except…

Except that's not what I wrote – or at least not the entirety of it. Here's what I actually penned: "The worst one can say about Seven Jewish Children is that it makes a link between the Holocaust perpetrated against the Jews, and another, newer, genocide of the Palestinians perpetrated by Israel. But the link is tenuous at best."

See the difference?

I hope you do, because if you don't it means our community has a serious problem. It means we have become blind hysterics. It means we are too scared to face anyone who doesn't share our particular worldview. It means we are vulnerable and weak. That's far more worrisome than any 10-minute play.

A short note: This is the last writing you'll see from me in these pages for at least a few months. I intend to use the time off to consider the future – indeed, if there is one – for this column. So long.

GRILLED CORN SALAD

3 tbsp fresh lime juice
3 tbsp cooking oil
3 tsp garlic salt
4 corn on the cobs, cleaned with husks pulled back but not removed
2 tsp chili powder
2 small, seeded, peeled, chopped avocado
2/3 c each, chopped red & yellow pepper
1/2 c cilantro, chopped
1/2 tsp salt

Preheat grill to medium heat. In a bowl combine lime juice, oil and garlic salt. Brush corn lightly with mixture and sprinkle with chili powder. Fold husks back up around corn. Place corn on grill for approx. 8-12 min. with lid closed or until corn is tender, turning every few minutes.

Add avocado, red & yellow peppers, cilantro and salt to remaining lime juice mixture. Cut corn kernels from the finished cobs by running sharp knife from top to bottom of cobs. Add to salad and toss to coat evenly. Serve at room temperature.

FIRST MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

This elegant building at 100 Yorkville Ave. was the first home of Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital. It opened in 1923 as the 50-bed Hebrew Maternity and Convalescent Hospital, offering kosher food, Yiddish-speaking staff and medical care by leading Jewish doctors. Three decades later, in 1953, the much-expanded Mount Sinai relocated to University Avenue. After a long period of construction, the original Yorkville premises reopened last month as a home and garden store capped by a residential tower. Only the historic façade has been preserved.

CJC, a plenary and the Rolling Stones

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

It's amazing that the Rolling Stones are still performing after 45 years. Even more impressive is that Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is 90 years old – twice as old, yet still strutting across the stage from end to end.

On May 31, CJC held its 29th plenary at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. I was honoured to attend. The excitement and exuberance was palpable. The room was filled with a "who's who" of Canadian society, including outgoing CJC co-presidents Rabbi Reuven Bulka and Sylvain Abitbol, Israeli Vice-Prime Minister Silvan Shalom, Julia and Henry Koschitsky, Prof. Irving Abela and award-winning Darfur activist Norman Epstein. One couldn't move a few inches without literally rubbing elbows with national dignitaries such as Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff and NDP boss Jack Layton.

Like a well-orchestrated concert, the speeches were well-timed, well-delivered and not verbose. Congress CEO Bernie Farber, bopped around the room with a youthful funk and vigour, a characteristic that serves to keep the CJC spirit shining. I like Bernie and always have. He has a well-honed savvy for community work and political manoeuvring, and a nishamah for the less fortunate that he's carried with him from his days working with abused children. And you gotta love his earring and the fact he's on Twitter. The boy's got moxy.

But what impressed even the most seasoned plenary- and gala-goers was the list of speakers and honoured guests.

Harper received the Saul Hayes Human Rights Award with elegance and a well-researched speech that elicited a standing ovation. Harper, appropriately, spoke about Canadians, both Jewish and non-Jewish, who toiled in the human rights trenches to change the landscape of our country from one where aboriginal children were stolen from their mothers' arms to a nation where former prime minister John Diefenbaker appointed a Jew, Louis Rasminsky, as governor of the Bank of Canada.

I had never heard the prolific and highly accomplished professor and MP Irwin Cotler speak, and I was quite surprised, at least initially, to hear inflections in his voice that sounded distinctly like Al Pacino in the movie Scent of a Woman. Cotler's address was inspiring and riveting, as he regularly drew upon thoughts from Jewish sources. I figure he must study Torah. That's admirable – a Jew who really is a "person of the book."

That was the thing about the CJC plenary: it was very Jewish, with no apologies. Ignatieff used Torah ideas, as did, of course, Rabbi Bulka. The chair of the board of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, David Koschitsky, who introduced his aunt and uncle, Julia and Henry, as recipients of the Samuel Bronfman Medal, referred to heart-breaking responsas that rabbis were forced to issue during the Holocaust.

The Jewish waters were warm at the CJC plenary.

In our community, there are regular murmurs about disbanding organizations or folding them into others. Such noise has surfaced about Congress over the last few years. While the CJC may not have the same rag-tag, on-the-street activism of old, its spirit is still very much alive. Its voice is loud and its successes – such as fighting white supremacists or mentoring survivors of the Rwandan massacre – are bold and groundbreaking.

Like the Rolling Stones, Congress has been around for a long time. And like Mick Jagger, it's likely to keep on belting 'em out for years to come. Long live the CJC.

Netanyahu accepts two-state solution

On condition of Israel as Jewish homeland, demilitarized Palestine

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Sunday called on Palestinian leaders to restart Middle East peace negotiations without preconditions, in a highly anticipated foreign policy address at Bar-Ilan University.

"I call on you, our Palestinian neighbours, and to the leadership of the Palestinian Authority: let us begin peace negotiations immediately, without preconditions," he said.

"Israel is committed to international agreements and expects all the other parties to fulfil their obligations as well."

In an apparent reversal of his own policy, Netanyahu also declared that he's prepared to see the creation of a Palestinian state, so long as the international community can guarantee that it doesn't have any military capabilities.

"Israel cannot agree to a Palestinian state unless it gets guarantees it is demilitarized," Netanyahu said. He also said that Jerusalem must remain the unified capital of Israel.

The address at Bar-Ilan came in the wake of the Obama administration's insistence that Israel impose a complete freeze on West Bank settlement construction and endorse a two-state solution.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu delivers his foreign policy address at Bar-Ilan University. Full text of speech at cjnews.com [Israel Sun photo]

During the speech, Netanyahu vowed that Israel would not build any new settlements and would refrain from expanding existing Israeli communities in the West Bank. Still, he said the government must be allowed to accommodate natural growth in these settlements.

Netanyahu has until now been adamant that a settlement freeze is unfeasible and that he would concentrate on strengthening the Palestinian economy, rather than agreeing to statehood.

The prime minister said he was prepared to meet with the leaders of neighbouring Arab countries at any time, to promote regional peace and to improve the Palestinian economy.

Netanyahu reiterated that Israel has no desire to control the Palestinian people and declared that both nations should be able to live side by side in peace.

"We want both Israeli and Palestinian children to live without war," Netanyahu said, but he added: "We must ask ourselves: why has peace not yet arrived after 60 years?"

Israel would not accept any situation in which it was forced to exist beside a terrorist state, Netanyahu said, adding that every withdrawal from settlement territory would contribute to such terror.

Finestone fought for society and the individual

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Sheila Finestone's sister related an anecdote at last week's funeral for the longtime parliamentarian and social justice activist that she believes illustrates the kind of person Finestone was.

About two months before her death from cancer on June 8 at age 82, Finestone reluctantly accepted that she needed full-time home care, said Diane Abbey-Livingston.

Abbey-Livingston, arriving at Finestone's first meeting with her new caregiver, found the young woman in an apartment building corridor in deep conversation with Finestone, who was leaning on a walker and carrying her pain medication.

But Finestone wasn't querying the care worker on her qualifications.

Sheila Finestone

She wanted to know all about her life: her homeland, her studies, her dreams. Finestone encouraged her to get her Canadian papers and to go back to school.

"To her very marrow, Sheila was committed to the potential in each of us," said Abbey-Livingston. She set ambitions and standards for herself, and she wanted others to pursue theirs with as much energy as she did, her sister said.

Her grandson, Jason Finestone, said that Finestone "did not hesitate to let others know if she felt they were not giving their best. She spoke her mind more frequently than expected, and sometimes desired."

Her youngest son, Stephen Finestone, said, "Mom was focused and slightly opinionated," but she respected and sought the views of others.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Museum Needs Funds

WINNIPEG — The Canadian Human Rights Museum in Winnipeg needs an extra $45 million to complete construction after inflation caused its original $265-million cost to grow to $310 million, it said last month. The brainchild of Izzy Asper, the late founder of Canwest Global Communications, it's currently being built in downtown Winnipeg and is slated to open in 2012. It's raised $160 million from three levels of government and $110 million in private funds. Manitoba Premier Gary Doer said his government is prepared to increase its $40-million contribution, but he expects private money to make up most of the gap.

Gaza Summit Hosted

OTTAWA — The federal government hosted an "expert-level" meeting of the Gaza Counter-Arms Smuggling Initiative (GCASI) in Ottawa last week. The June 10-11 symposium is "a clear sign of our commitment to international efforts to bring about a durable ceasefire between Israel and Hamas [which rules Gaza]," Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon said. "We look forward to continuing work with our partners on the program of action to co-ordinate efforts to stop the flow of arms, ammunition and related material into the Gaza Strip." GCASI members are Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Britain and the United States. Last week's meeting aimed to implement a plan formulated last March.

Israeli Journalist Dies

JERUSALEM — Nechemia Meyers, an Israeli-American journalist and spokesperson for the Weizmann Institute of Science, died last week at age 79 after a long illness. Meyers wrote hundreds of columns chronicling life in Israel for Jewish and secular publications. In the months before his death, Meyers was compiling his columns for publication as a book, according to his wife, Adeerah. Meyers was born in Minneapolis, Minn., and lived in Los Angeles before making aliyah in 1951. He lived in Kibbutz Urim in the Negev until joining the Government Press Office in 1958. He moved to Rehovot in 1962 when he was named the publications director and spokesperson for the Weizmann Institute there.

Rev. Blames Zionists

WASHINGTON — U.S. President Barack Obama's former pastor said he misspoke when he said Jews are keeping him from talking to Obama, saying he meant Zionists. "I misspoke," Rev. Jeremiah Wright said on a satellite radio show. "Let me just say Zionists." He continued: "I am not talking about all Jews, all people of the Jewish faith." Wright was referring to remarks he made to a Virginia newspaper that "Them Jews aren't going to let him talk to me. I told my baby daughter that he'll talk to me in five years when he's a lame duck, or in eight years when he's out of office." Obama broke with Wright last year after learning he blamed U.S. policies for 9-11 and had links to Nation of Islam leader Louis Farrakhan.

Cdns. Less Tolerant Than Thought: Poll

TORONTO — A new poll suggests Canadians may not be as tolerant of Judaism as believed.

The national online survey, which was conducted in April by Angus Reid Strategies and released earlier this month, shows that while nearly three-quarters of Canadians have a favourable opinion of Christianity, a little more than half – 53 per cent – feel the same way about Judaism.

The poll of 1,000 adults conducted for Maclean's magazine shows that just 40 per cent of respondents claim to have a good or basic understanding of Jewish teachings, compared to 86 per cent for Christian teachings.

Christianity also dominated on the question of whether respondents have friends who follow specific religions, with 89 per cent of those polls reporting that they have a Christian friend. Judaism was second, at 45 per cent.

A slight majority – 56 per cent – said they would find it acceptable for one of their children to marry a Jew.

Just 14 per cent said Judaism "encourages violence," while Islam led in that category, with 45 per cent saying it encourages violence.

The poll found that most Canadians – 68 per cent – oppose public funding of private Jewish schools. Only 51 per cent oppose tax dollars going to Catholic, evangelical or other Christian schools.

One of the poll's key findings is that 62 per cent of respondents believe Canadian laws and norms shouldn't be modified to accommodate minorities.

Ottawa reviews funding for York U conference

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A controversial conference on Israel slated to start Monday at York University has drawn the eye of Gary Goodyear, minister of state for science and technology, who last week called for a review of federal funding to the event.

"Israel-Palestine: Mapping Models of Statehood and Paths to Peace" received $19,750 from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council (SSHRC) in January and features more than 50 guest speakers, many of whom are renowned for their anti-Israel views.

"We feel this conference is really not an academic conference… and does not meet rigorous academic criteria," said Howard English, spokesperson for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

He said the event has an anti-Israel tilt and many presenters aren't strictly considered academics. "There is a predominance [of speakers]… who have a history of vehement anti-Israel statements," he added, noting that many – such as Ali Abunimah, co-founder of the Electronic Intifada, a website that claims Israel is an apartheid state – aren't objective presenters.

"To say [Abunimah] is anti-Israel would be a mild understatement," English said. "The preoccupation of this conference with a 'one-state' solution will only highlight the legitimacy of the demise of Israel as a Jewish state."

The Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT), which represents 65,000 academics, is calling for Goodyear's resignation because of his "unprecedented efforts to interfere" with the June 22-24 conference.

The CAUT said that Goodyear's decision to contact SSHRC "to express political concerns is not something we have seen in this country since the McCarthy period," and that the move "sets a very dangerous precedent."

Last month, York University president Mamdouh Shoukri said that the "freedom of independent scholars to organize events such as conferences on matters of legitimate academic inquiry goes to the very heart of academic freedom," adding that it "would be entirely inappropriate for the university administration to intervene in or to take responsibility for the academic content of such events, provided that they do not offend Canadian law."

A peer review committee of scholars from a number of academic disciplines awarded the SSHRC grant. Goodyear contacted SSHRC last week to ask that a second review committee assess whether the event still deserves funding, given that the initial proposal didn't have details about who would be speaking.

SSHRC spokesperson Trevor Lynn, confirmed Goodyear had spoken to the council, and that it asked conference organizer and Osgoode Hall associate law professor Bruce Ryder to provide details about any changes to the conference since the grant was made.

Under SSHRC guidelines, applicants are allowed "minor" changes to conferences, but approval for major changes, such as an event's theme or focus, must be made in writing. Lynn wouldn't speculate on what SSHRC might do if it decided major changes had been made.

Sharryn Aiken, a Jewish law professor at Queen's University and a lead organizer of the event, urged the Jewish community to remain open-minded about it. She also refuted claims about non-academic speakers.

"At least 90 per cent of the confirmed speakers are academics affiliated with academic institutions around the world," Aiken told The CJN.

Sharryn Aiken

Aiken said speakers such as Meron Benvenisti, former deputy mayor of Jerusalem, and David Berlin, an ex-pat Israeli and former editor of the Walrus, who, while not academics, were accepted based on their experience.

Aiken admitted that Abunimah "raises a lot of anxiety," but she defended his participation, calling his book on Israel, One Country, "a thoughtful book about the way forward out of the impasse. I'm not a self-hating Jew who is anti-Israel," she said. "I am deeply disappointed by the reaction in the [Jewish] community and by those who know me and who continue to insist that this conference is all about promoting hate."

Lest we forget...

From the editor's desk...

A recent letter to the editor of the Jerusalem Post by Malka Hillel Shulewitz twigs our memory, conscience and our resolve like a tuning fork resonating with synchronicity with sound waves of the heart.

An acknowledged scholar on the subject of the Jews from Arab lands, Shulewitz was commenting on a review of the recently published Stories of Daily Life, Upheaval and Escape from Modern Babylon, edited by Tamar Morad, Dennis Shasha and Robert Shasha, Palgrave Studies in Oral History.

In the course of the review she wrote: "Sadly, it is not only the Jews of Iraq that are forgotten; it is the Jews of all the Arab countries who were the victims of Islamic hatred and brutality. They were exiled, leaving behind vast communal and private property. The majority immigrated to Israel, and today they and their progeny comprise almost half of the population of the Jewish state."

The timing of Shulewitz's letter was especially propitious.

Two days earlier, U.S. President Barack Obama delivered his watershed speech at Al-Azhar University in Cairo, in which he spoke long and pointedly about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

The conflict-related remarks comprised nearly one-quarter of the president's address. It was very clearly part of the freshly painted, new horizon in U.S.-Muslim relations toward which he was trying to steer the American ship of state.

"On the other hand," Obama said after he spoke about the founding of the State of Israel in relation to the persecution and suffering of the Jewish people, "it is also undeniable that the Palestinian people – Muslims and Christians – have suffered in pursuit of a homeland. For more than 60 years, they have endured the pain of dislocation. Many wait in refugee camps in the West Bank, Gaza, and neighbouring lands for a life of peace and security that they have never been able to lead."

Obama's aim is to win the confidence and trust of the majority of the Muslim world, without which he believes, the United States will not be successful in brokering a peace agreement between Palestinians and Israelis.

We hope he does indeed gain that trust and confidence. But it must decidedly not be at the expense of truth.

Obama and his advisers hold the view that tactically, it is counter-productive to delve into the full story of the past to ascertain precisely how and why Palestinians are still enduring the "the pain of dislocation" some 60 years after the creation of Israel. He wants the sides to stop "pointing fingers." He wants to proceed quickly. Indeed, his special Mideast envoy, Senator George Mitchell, was dispatched the following week to meet with regional leaders.

But not pointing fingers as the president urges Israelis and Palestinians, does not also mean letting go of the scales of justice.

Shulewitz correctly scolds us.

"We have allowed an important historic event – the virtual dissolution of the Jewish people's most ancient Diaspora – to fade away, and to be almost forgotten… We have remained silent as the Arabs continue to use their refugees as political pawns, propped up with billions from international coffers (not from their oil-rich brethren) for over 60 years."

We can understand Obama's reluctance to speak in Cairo of the Jews' "pain of dislocation" from their homes throughout the Arab world, and the hostility and hatred of the Arab governments that brought it about. Though we ought not condone it.

Nor would we ever condone the president and his advisers not weighing in the balance of the final determination of a just agreement, the dislocation from Arab lands and dispossession of the property of 750,000 Jews.

There were some commentators who pointed to the omission of the Jewish refugees from the president's speech. International law and human rights expert, Anne Bayefsky, a senior fellow of the Hudson Institute, was particularly scathing.

"But judging by Obama's speech," she wrote in the Jewish World Review, "only one 'dislocation' counts. After placing the Holocaust side by side with the Palestinian 'pain of dislocation,' he ignored the dislocation of 800,000 Jewish refugees from all over the Arab Middle East in response to the creation of Israel."

Bayefsky concluded her observations with unremitting disparagement and pessimism. "President Obama's meticulously planned and executed Egyptian speech marks the lowest point in the U.S. presidency's understanding and appreciation of the Jewish state, its history, and its people's future. Added to his administration's evident infirmity on Iran, the speech of June 4, 2009, by the supposed leader of the free world will be remembered as a major decline in human history."

In light of the approaches to Mideast peace by people such as former U.S. president Jimmy Carter and the entire State Department establishment advising former president Harry Truman, it is hard to accept Bayefsky's trenchant condemnation of Obama.

It is up to us, the Jewish people, to ensure that where it is lacking, Obama's "understanding and appreciation of the Jewish state, its history, and its people's future" is fully filled in.

Correction

In "The Madoff fiasco," the story about financier Bernard Madoff that was published in the June 11 issue of The CJN, the Women's Zionist Organization of America was incorrectly identified as Hadassah-WIZO. Canadian Hadassah-WIZO was not affected by losses incurred by Madoff's Ponzi scheme. We regret the error.

Shaviv takes role at Mercaz

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, has been hired to direct the committee that's restructuring the former board of Jewish education.

In his new role, he'll serve as adviser to the lay leaders who are preparing a report on the goals of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's reworked Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (the Mercaz) and will develop a job description for its future director, with the aim of filling that position by September 2010.

Paul Shaviv

He will also oversee the entity's day-to-day operations, together with an interim co-ordinator, who is expected to be hired before the school year begins this September.

Earlier this year, the federation made major cuts to the Mercaz, eliminating 10 full-time jobs and two contract positions, effective April 3. As well, two full-time and one half-time employee were reassigned to other duties at the federation, leaving only four employees still on staff.

In addition, Seymour Epstein, the federation's former senior vice-president for the Mercaz, was offered a high-level position related to Jewish education with federation, a spokesperson said at the time. However, Epstein is also no longer with the federation.

Writing in The CJN, David Koschitzky, chair of the federation's board, said that the aim of the cuts was "to increase direct financial support to Jewish education, through an additional $500,000 for tuition subsidies."

News of Shaviv's appointment came as he was preparing to leave for Israel to accept the prestigious Max M. Fisher Prize for Jewish Education in the Diaspora in a June 25 ceremony.

He's one of two recipients to win this year's award, and he's the first Canadian to receive the annual honour, which has been awarded since 1999 by the L.A. Pincus Fund for Jewish Education in the Diaspora, an independent foundation based in Jerusalem.

Shaviv, who turned 60 at the end of May, anticipates his new position will take up to a day and a half a week while he continues with his responsibilities at TanenbaumCHAT.

His term is expected to last for 12 to 15 months, the federation said.

The board of TanenbaumCHAT has given Shaviv a part-time leave of absence.

Shaviv said his first priorities at the Mercaz include finding an interim director for the coming year, "to ensure that [the Mercaz's] essential services are kept running."

One of the services he noted is the Board of Licence, which ascertains teachers' salaries according to their qualifications. "It's always done centrally, so they're uniform across the city," Shaviv said.

As well, he cited the Midrasha L'Morim, a Jewish teacher training and certification program.

Shaviv began his career as a Hillel director in his native London, England, in the early 1970s before becoming director of Jewish studies and vice-principal at Carmel College, a Jewish boarding school in London that closed in 1997.

Before moving to Toronto in 1998, Shaviv – who is nearing completion of a book about leadership management and structure of Jewish high schools – served for four years as principal of Bialik High School in Montreal. In the late 1980s, he was on the founding team of London's Immanuel College, a school started by then British Chief Rabbi Immanuel Jakobovits.

Golf tourney benefits students with learning disabilities

By Daniel Horowitz

The late Max Guttmann believed that no child should ever be left behind. The community leader, who passed away in 1998 at the age of 65, felt that if you invest in children when they're young, you save them for a lifetime.

Fortunately for many of Toronto's Jewish students with special needs, his sons, Craig and Sean, feel the same way.

"Over 25 years ago, my father met with one of She'arim's founding rabbis, Rabbi Joseph Kelman, who told dad that the school was going to miss the teachers' payroll and needed his help," recalls Craig. "My dad called a group of his friends to a parlour meeting and they raised more than $25,000 in one night. Since then, my dad was a big supporter of the school. He was a Holocaust survivor and someone who, because of the war, never had a chance to gain a formal education. He really loved kids and wanted to do what he could to help them."

A year after their father died, Sean and Craig wanted to honour his memory while raising money to keep Max's legacy of helping children alive. In 1999, the Max Guttmann Memorial Golf Tournament was born.

Celebrating its tenth anniversary this year, the tournament takes place on July 14 at Pheasant Run Golf Club. In its previous nine years of operation, the tournament has raised more than $500,000 in support of Jewish children with learning disabilities.

In light of the fact that She'arim decided to close its doors a year ago, the Max Guttmann Memorial Golf Tournament will continue raising funds so that UJA Federation can meet the unique educational needs of the school's former students in special programs at TanenbaumCHAT's Wallenberg campus, Associated Hebrew Schools and Netivot Hatorah Day School.

The late Max Guttmann z"l

Roberta Newman is one of many parents who can attest to the great work being done through these programs. Her 13-year-old daughter, Leora, a former She'arim student, was part of TanenbaumCHAT's Grade 8 program this year. She was also named the class Valedictorian.

"I can't say enough about what TanenbaumCHAT has done for my daughter," says Newman. "Leora has made tremendous progress in the last year thanks to the dedication of the teachers and the staff. They have provided all the kids with a great atmosphere in which to learn. All the parents were so excited and relieved when UJA Federation and TanenbaumCHAT stepped forward. They made a commitment to our children; they've treated our children with love and respect and truly made them feel at home."

Sean (l) and Craig Guttmann

Tournament participation will ensure small class sizes and dedicated support specialists so these wonderful kids will gain self-esteem, positive learning skills and a bright future.

The tournament will include a barbecue, refreshments, contests, dinner, silent auction, awards ceremony, and much, much more.

"My dad would have loved this golf tournament," says Craig. "It's a chance for people to come out, enjoy some golf, enjoy some great food, and just enjoy themselves. It's also a day in memory of a man who loved to give back to his community, just like those who participate will be doing."

Connecting to Judaism through summer camp

Raphi Massil was 15 when he came to Toronto from his native Bombay in December 2004, and like anybody starting a new life in a new country, he yearned to fit in, find his place in his new home, and make friends his own age.

Thanks to community funding, Raphi was able to do just that by attending Camp George in Parry Sound during his first summer in Canada, and his life has never been the same since.

"Going to Camp George was definitely a turning point in my life in Canada. I made a lot of friends and learned a lot of new things about, not only Canadian culture – as I was still a relative newcomer to this country – but about Judaism, too," says a smiling Raphi, who now studies business at Brock University. "I made so many friends at camp during that first year; some even have come to visit me at Brock. Going to Jewish summer camp and having so many new Jewish friends has given me the urge to move to Bathurst Street where most of them live, but we still haven't had the chance to do that as my parents have jobs close to where we currently live. Still, I talk to most of my camp friends at least twice a week."

Raphi Massil enjoying Camp George

After having worked his way up the Camp George ladder, Raphi was made a senior counselor in 2008. This year, the young man is most anxious to return to the camp as a ropes specialist. "I was very nervous about going to camp at the beginning," he says. "The first few days were overwhelming as it was all new to me and I didn't understand how things would work. I was also very nervous because I still had an accent and I thought there might be a communication problem between me and the campers and other counselors. Now, I am so excited for the summer. All in all, the Jewish camp experience has given me a lot of good friends and a lot of new Jewish values which will stay with me forever. If it wasn't for camp I wouldn't be connected to Jewish life."

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto makes it possible for approximately 1,000 children to experience Jewish summer camp annually.

Jewish Toronto is published as a community service by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Response from Israel

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu looked squarely at the video camera filming his foreign policy address Sunday at Bar-Ilan University in Ramat Gan, but he was also speaking directly to U.S President Barack Obama in Washington. Responding almost point for point to the president's speech 10 days earlier at Al-Azhar University in Cairo, Netanyahu accepted a two-state solution, as long as the international community ensures that an independent Palestinian state does not constitute a military threat to Israel.

Netanyahu also accepted that his government would build no new settlements, but he insisted on the right of allowing the natural growth of the communities.

He urged the Palestinian leadership in straightforward terms to return to the negotiating table. "I call on you, our Palestinian neighbors, and to the leadership of the Palestinian Authority: Let us begin peace negotiations immediately, without preconditions. Israel is committed to international agreements and expects all the other parties to fulfil their obligations as well."

To be sure, Netanyahu was also speaking to the large majority of Israelis who hover at the centre of the political spectrum. While holding on to the centrist Israeli who seeks a safe way of disengaging from the Palestinians, he wanted to give enough to Obama to keep the process moving and the relationship intact.

Preliminary comments by Obama officials on Netanyahu's speech were positive. White House press secretary Robert Gibbs characterized Netanyahu's remarks as an "important step forward."

More importantly, Gibbs used the occasion to reinforce to Israelis that Obama understood the principles as well as the nuances of Israel's side of the process. "The president is committed to two states, a Jewish state of Israel and an independent Palestine, in the historic homeland of both peoples. He believes this solution can and must ensure both Israel's security and the fulfilment of the Palestinians' legitimate aspirations for a viable state, and he welcomes Prime Minister Netanyahu's endorsement of that goal" (emphasis added).

Response from Iran

The White House did not offer positive comments regarding the presidential election in Iran last Friday. Nor did any fair-minded, democratic country. Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was returned as president in a process that his chief challenger Mohsen Moussavi branded a "charade." The election was rigged, most believe. Large groups of dejected and disbelieving voters have taken to the streets to riot their displeasure with the results. The mullahs' contempt for the democratic process places U.S. policy makers in a bind. Defrauding and deceiving the majority of the Iranian voters was the mullahs' response to Washington's call for a new beginning to Iranian-American relations.

A study done for Canadian Jewish Congress found that women were underrepresented in positions of power in Jewish organizations in Canada, both as employees and volunteers. Even those who held professional or managerial positions earned less than their male counterparts. Committees to address the problem were formed in cities across the country.

Oh, Woe Be Us!

If Martians landed in Toronto today and wanted to learn more about our Jewish community, they would think our entire community hinged on the belief that some people have hated us and other people still do. I realize that the Holocaust and anti-Semitism are issues that do need to be discussed, but other aspects of Judaism should receive equal coverage in The CJN. Perhaps you should include more articles, such as the one about the Dead Sea Scrolls, which are intelligent and interesting, instead of a bajillion articles about Iran and anti-Semitic plays that no one bothers to go see anyway ("Prof explores journey of Dead Sea Scrolls," CJN, June 11). Otherwise, we will end up with a generation that defines their Judaism by hysterically defending it without even knowing what they are defending. Remember that your paper is called the Jewish news, not the Canadian – Oh, Woe Be Us, the Hated People – News.

Friendship at what price

The history of the Yom Kippur War is about to repeat itself. In 1973, then-prime minister Golda Meir and defence minister Moshe Dayan adamantly refused to use the air force for a pre-emptive strike. The reason cited was that the United States would strongly disapprove, and they sadly concluded that for the sake of U.S. support, Israel would have to absorb the first blow. This pattern is now being repeated with Iran. The 1973 absorption of the first blow cost Israel 2,700 soldiers. What will U.S. President Barack Obama's reluctance and hesitation cost Israel if it is obliged to absorb the first nuclear strike by Iran? I leave it to the readers' imagination.

CJC plenary was heimish

I attended my first Canadian Jewish Congress plenary on May 31, and now regret I haven't attended others ("CJC gives Harper human rights award," CJN, June 4). It was a real eye-opener! Along with hearing Canada's top political leaders, we were able to revel in the bestowing of a most deserving and prestigious award to Canadian Jewish leaders and philanthropists Julia and Henry Koschitsky.

This was really a heimish affair. While hundreds attended, it had more the feel of a family simchah. I guess our pride as a community was showing, and we should thank CJC for its leadership in putting together a perfect day of amcha and advocacy. In the CJC, our community has much to be proud.

People search

I am looking for Joseph Ryger (Yosi Rygier?), a Holocaust survivor who was born in Lubaczow, Austria, in 1913 and who later lived in Warsaw. He survived the war, apparently with a wife and a son. He lived in Toronto with his sister sometime after World War II. I found a a manuscript written by him among the personal effects of my mother, Mollie Blum, who passed away in February 2009. It is possible that it was originally given to my father, the late Hugo Blum, who passed away in Toronto in 1964. I would be grateful if anyone with knowledge of Joseph Ryger would contact me.

We found them!

My sister recently wished to renew contact with a close friend of ours, Ezra Moses, who immigrated to Canada 40 years ago. My efforts to locate Ezra and his family, from Hyderabad where I live, were unsuccessful. While I was browsing the Internet, I got the impression that the Jewish community is close-knit. I sent an e-mail with the information I had about the family to The CJN, and I received a reply saying that the paper would publish my letter. The CJN did publish my letter ("People search," June 4), and like a miracle, I got an e-mail from Ezra's wife, Betty, that week.

Tough economic times drive European voters to far right

By DINAH SPRITZER
JTA

Gains by anti-Semitic, xenophobic and racist far-right parties in June 4 to 7 elections for the European Parliament were a reminder of how voters across Europe gravitate toward fringe parties and extremists during tough economic times.

As in the United States, Europe is experiencing levels of unemployment not seen since the Great Depression. The financial misery has given rise here to increased nationalism, skewing an election of representatives whose job is mostly to pass Europe-wide regulations on food and safety standards, the environment and internal market competition.

"As far as Jews are concerned, the election results are a warning that in a period of crisis, people vote with extremists," Serge Cwajgenbaum, secretary general of the European Jewish Congress, told JTA from Paris. "It doesn't matter if it is left or right to angry voters, as long as it is extreme."

For the first time since the 1930s, a neo-fascist group in Britain, the British National Party, received enough votes to enter a legislative body. Of the two representatives the party will send to the European Union (EU) Parliament in Brussels, one is Nick Griffin, a convicted Holocaust denier accused of chanting "Death to Jews!" at a 1981 political rally in Leeds.

Krisztina Morvai, the newly elected Hungarian parliamentarian from the far-right Jobbik party, blogged earlier this month in response to accusations of xenophobia: "I would be glad if the so-called proud Hungarian Jews would go back to playing with their tiny little circumcised d---s rather than vilifying me."

Her party won three seats, marking Jobbik's first entry into EU politics.

In Austria, far-right parties won 18 per cent of the vote, a greater percentage than anywhere else in Europe. One of the parties, the Freedom party, or FPO, campaigned with posters reading: "FPO veto for Turkey and Israel in the EU." With 13 per cent of Austrian votes, the party more than doubled the share it received in the last European Parliament elections, in 2004.

The ascent of the far right in a record-low turnout of 43 per cent of 388 million eligible voters was a message to European institutions that worries over immigration and anger over failed domestic policies take precedence over any pan-European agenda, analysts said.

About 30 of the 736 new European Parliament members come from extreme-right parties in countries including Hungary, Italy, Britain, the Netherlands, Finland, Romania and Bulgaria – up from 23 in 2004. The strongest showing in the elections was for centre-right parties, which took victories across Europe and trounced their socialist rivals. The centrist conservatives have the largest voting bloc in the Parliament.

But apathy – national voter turnouts in Europe frequently are above 60 per cent – and the perception that the vote was for a distant, insignificant legislature may mean that extremists will not do as well in upcoming national elections in individual European countries.

Clara Marina O'Donnell, an analyst at the Centre for European Reform in London, cautioned against interpreting the far-right gains as a major political upheaval.

"We have a growth in certain countries of extreme parties, but they only got a few seats and the growth is very much marginal," O'Donnell said. "People feel the European Parliament does not count, so they feel more tempted to vote extreme, often electing candidates they would never think of choosing for their national parliaments."

European institutions in Brussels comprised of country representatives have no unified foreign policy or jurisdiction over crucial national issues such as immigration, education or health care.

But they occasionally make policy – for example, when the European Parliament froze a planned upgrade of EU relations with Israel during Israel's war against Hamas in Gaza in January. They may also have a hand in setting European rules on shchitah, Jewish ritual slaughter, which is banned in some European countries.

More worrying to Jews and other minorities is that extremist parties who gained ground in the recent European vote show no sign of going away.

The Freedom party, for instance, is already in the Austrian Parliament, with 34 out of 183 seats, and twice has been a junior partner in coalition governments. The possibility that Jobbik will win seats in Hungary's Parliament in 2010 elections is no longer remote, given that the party captured nearly 15 per cent of the vote in Hungary for EU Parliament.

In the Netherlands, the openly anti-Muslim, anti-immigrant Freedom party – a far-right party that, though supportive of Israel, has been condemned by European Jewish groups – defeated the mainstream socialists to finish a close second behind the centre-right, with 17 per cent of the vote.

"If, on the EU level, they do not stop this kind of extremism, it will get worse," Cwajgenbaum said. "There is something wrong with how people are being educated, or not educated, in these countries."

There are some positive signs, with the far right garnering almost no support in Germany, France, the Czech Republic and Poland.

In addition, the new extreme right members of the European Parliament are not expected to have much influence in Brussels because, as nationalists, they will have difficulty coming up with a united position – as they demonstrated in their 2004 failure to form a voting bloc.

"Within the European Parliament, there are people who need to be quarantined," said the Simon Wiesenthal Center's director for international relations in Paris, Shimon Samuels, "and there are enough centrists who will make sure that happens."

Hungarian Jews reeling from far-right party's gains

By THOMAS ORSZAG-LAND
JTA

A Hungarian far-right party, Jobbik, catapulted from the fringes of political life to grab nearly 15 per cent of Hungary's vote in European Union parliamentary elections, sending shock waves through Europe's fourth-largest Jewish community.

Having come in third in the voting in Hungary, Jobbik is likely to acquire a significant parliamentary presence in Hungarian elections scheduled for next year.

While the far right made gains in EU parliamentary voting elsewhere on the continent, Jobbik's success was extraordinary. It was the first time the party had run for the EU Parliament, and the results show that Jobbik, which had run in local elections mostly on joint tickets with Hungary's main right-ist opposition party, Fidesz, is a potent political force on its own. Fidesz won 56 per cent of the vote Sunday, while Hungary's ruling socialists suffered a crushing defeat, garnering only about 17 per cent.

Many Hungarian Jews are now asking how this could happen.

George Konrad, a Hungarian Jewish intellectual and author, blamed Fidesz leader Viktor Orban for encouraging the far right in the hope of absorbing Jobbik's supporters into Fidesz's populist camp.

"Orban has miscalculated and created a political monster," Konrad said.

Budapest, with some 80,000 Jews, has the largest Jewish population of any central European city. Some play an important role in Hungarian political life, and Hungary has a relatively low level of anti-Semitism compared to other European countries.

But with the economic downturn hitting eastern and central Europe particularly hard, old stereotypes about Jews have been revived. In Hungary, as elsewhere in Europe, far-right parties have gained.

"The crisis generated by the recession is about discrimination, inequality, xenophobia, racism, violence and repression," Irene Khan, secretary general of Amnesty International, said upon release of the organization's 2009 world report.

The Jobbik party – a Hungarian word that means both "better" and "further to the right" – is led by Gabor Vona, 30, a former high school history teacher. Though he denies being a racist, Vona says the party keeps an "open mind" about the veracity of the Holocaust.

Krisztina Morvai, 46, who led Jobbik's list of candidates in the EU parliamentary elections, will hold one of the three seats won by the party. Articulate and passionate, she is a former Fulbright scholar from the University of Wisconsin and a well-known author and human rights lawyer who teaches law at a prestigious university in Budapest.

Morvai has also earned attention for remarks seen as disparaging Jews. In March, a German magazine reported that it had discovered a speech by Morvai in which she advised the "liberal-Bolshevik Zionists" to "start thinking of where to flee and where to hide." In the run-up to the EU election, she sparked outrage with an obscene, anti-Semitic post in an online forum. Morvai has also accused Israeli leaders of war crimes.

The Hungarian Alliance of Jewish Communities has called Morvai's invective obscene and openly anti-Semitic.

Jobbik's campaign, which featured the slogan "Hungary for Hungarians," was based on whipping up fear among foreign bankers, industrialists and journalists. The party said it sought to "rescue" the nation from a political elite that has sold out to "enemies within our midst," which many took to be thinly veiled references to Jews and other minorities, notably Roma, or Gypsies.

"The greatest surprise is that two decades after the collapse of Soviet power, a bright young generation of east Europeans should now put its faith in the tired anti-Semitic stereotypes that were current here a century ago," said historian Rafael Vago of Tel Aviv University. "I see the gravest danger in the consequent infiltration of racist perceptions and hate speech into political and civil discourse."

Vago noted that in a 300-yard stretch along a central Budapest avenue, he found several infamous and long-discredited anti-Semitic pamphlets on sale by at least three newspaper venders.

The favourite target of the Jobbik-allied Hungarian Guard has been the Roma. At least seven deaths of Roma by thugs armed with firebombs have been reported, and terrified Roma have taken to guarding their rural communities from nighttime assaults.

Though it boasts fewer than 1,000 members, the Hungarian Guard enjoys significant popular support in the country.

Divine eyeglasses

On May 9, I started to see for the first time. For the first 45 years of my life, I had been blind to human potential.

On that Shabbat morning, our synagogue held a bar and bat mitzvah celebration. Technically, at bar and bat mitzvah age, children are mandated with adult responsibilities. But in a larger sense, bar and bat mitzvah celebrations are a way of recognizing young adults as full members of the community.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

This particular bar/bat mitzvah was different. The participants were much older, with some in their 50s. They were celebrating now because they had never done so in their youth. The participants were intellectually disabled. Years ago they had stood on the periphery, and their bar and bat mitzvahs were overlooked.

Throughout history, the disabled have been stigmatized. In Sparta, "deformed" babies were tossed off a mountain. Martin Luther believed disabled children were "changelings," demonic beings in the form of a child. He advocated drowning the "changelings." The Nazis, starting in 1939, initiated "Aktion T4," a program to kill the disabled.

These negative attitudes continue to have an impact. Until recently, people with intellectual disabilities were often hidden away. The developmentally disabled were viewed as blemished, and people simply couldn't see the person beyond the disability.

On that Shabbat morning, our view of the disabled changed. A powerful passage in the Book of Samuel states that "man sees only with his eyes, but God sees into the heart." Humanity's perspective is superficial, limited by what our eyes can see. But on that Shabbat, we were fitted with divine eyeglasses and saw the beauty of the human soul.

We saw the pride of these participants, who were waiting for this ceremony their entire lives. In their shy demeanour and gentle words, we could see the journey they had taken in search of dignity. And their faces radiated love. We all felt the connection between the participants and everyone in the room.

This celebration was more significant for the participants' families. They had experienced the sting of exclusion as their siblings were isolated without friends, as their sons and daughters bounced from program to program. They were also waiting for the day that their sons, daughters, brothers and sisters would take their place in the community.

But the people most affected were the congregants. In standing ovation after standing ovation, community members opened their hearts to the participants. It was a family reunion. We, the community, were welcoming back the men and women we had long excluded.

On that Shabbat morning, our congregation looked past superficial disabilities, and appreciated the gift of community. And for a few short moments, we all wore divine eyeglasses.

Education cuts are hasty and shortsighted

In July, 2007, amid much fanfare, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Board of Jewish Education became the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education, widely called the Mercaz – Hebrew for "centre." "The name says what the priorities are," the Mercaz chair Lou Greenbaum exulted. This spring, less than two years later and amid much less fanfare, the Mercaz was abruptly downsized and thus marginalized, shedding at least 10 full-time jobs.

Gil Troy in Montreal

What happened in Toronto is happening throughout the Jewish world. The last two decades' gains in Jewish education and identity-building are disappearing as quickly as people's net worths have plummeted. The legendary Boston Board of Jewish Education recently lost 80 per cent of its funding and will likely close. Birthright Israel, perhaps the most successful Jewish program of the 21st century, has turned away thousands of applicants this year because of limited funds.

These cutbacks are dangerous. Capitalism is cyclical – economic busts are usually followed by economic booms – but education and identity-building are more linear. Opportunities missed are rarely recovered. Children uneducated frequently remain ignorant. Young people turned off are rarely turned back on. Jewish leaders in Toronto and elsewhere can't afford to be shortsighted. We must continue investing in education and outreach programs that foster Jewish pride and knowledge.

During the last two decades, Jewish education and identity-building boomed. Philanthropic visionaries such as Charles Bronfman, Michael Steinhardt and Lynn Schusterman made funding Israel trips, initiating teen programs, and even building Jewish day schools sexy.

They understood – as did many other generous donors and passionate professionals – that anti-Semitism doesn't pose the greatest threat to this generation of thoroughly North Americanized Jews that it did to the immigrant generation. In fact, Jews today risked being loved to death by intermarriage, especially after having been bored to tears by so many initial encounters in synagogues, Jewish schools, and youth groups. The writer Leon Wieseltier adds that this generation's great crime is not intermarriage but ignorance – most are extremely educated in secular subjects and appallingly uninformed Jewishly.

These insights – backed by sobering demographic studies – galvanized the community. Birthright Israel, which has brought more than 120,000 18-to-26-year-olds on free 10-day trips to Israel, has been the flagship program, generating the most buzz. But Birthright's success reflected a broader reorientation toward education and identity building, accompanied by massive investments in teachers, teacher training, curricula, programs, infrastructure and central educational agencies such as the Mercaz.

I recall that in Montreal, as we planned our own massive, ambitious "Gen J" program to invest in our kids' future, Toronto's 2007 launch of the Mercaz inspired us – and made us feel a tad inadequate. We wondered whether our community could mobilize similar support for Jewish education. At the risk of feeding the Toronto-Montreal rivalry – although all of us should compete regarding who cares most about Jewish education and identity – so far Montreal has kept Jewish education front and centre, despite the economic downturn.

In fairness, Toronto continues to lead North America in providing tuition assistance, fostering quality Jewish day schools, and identity building. Still, shrinking the Mercaz is a big blow. Boards of Jewish education such as the Mercaz serve essential roles in professionalizing teachers, coaching administrators, providing quality control, nurturing reforms and upholding city-wide standards.

"I have always felt that the Mercaz did very important work and made significant contributions to Jewish education in Toronto," Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University told me via e-mail. "They were, for example, indispensable for us at York in making our Jewish teacher education program work. They also provided indispensable services to many day schools and many teachers, particularly new teachers. I am very worried about how this gap will be filled. From conversations that I have had, I sense that my concerns are shared by many respected educators here in Toronto."

The financial crisis is forcing Jewish communities worldwide to clarify their priorities, abandon unnecessary projects and focus on initiatives that work. Such retrenchment, while always painful and involuntary, can be constructive, resulting in more focused and effective communities. But hasty and thoughtless cutbacks can be particularly destructive, dooming this generation to ignorance and apathy.

A different kind of aliyah

Yehuda Halevi wrote, "My heart is in the East, but I am at the ends of the West." Me, too. But I don't think the Diaspora is vapid and that Israel is the only place to live a full Jewish life. No amount of "you should make aliyah" guilt will inspire those who feel most at home here and believe in the imperative to make this community the best we can with dynamic synagogues, day schools, community centres, adult education institutes, Jewish film festivals, walks for Israel, charitable fundraising and more. Bravo to those who choose to live in Eretz Yisrael, and bravo to those who build and sustain Jewish life here, and bravo to those who live somewhere in the middle.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Toronto

So, let's think about aliyah in different terms. I've been a passionate advocate for Israel throughout my career as a rabbi, and I've lead eight trips there in the past four years to help people build a special bond with the land. I have helped people make the decision to make aliyah and have written many recommendations for young people taking a year in Israel in "gap" programs. Last year in this paper, I had a lively exchange with Rabbi Dow Marmur about "part-time aliyah."

So I was truly excited to hear about a new idea from my colleague, Rabbi Stanley Davids, who coined the term aliyat hanefesh, or spiritual aliyah. Rabbi Paul Kipnes calls it "a soul-driven aliyah that places love for Israel near the centre of our lives. Aliyat hanefesh could be expressed by visits for study and for vacations, by making certain that our children and grandchildren have extensive personal experiences of Israel, by becoming informed advocates for Israel and by personally making certain to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut as a religious holiday each May."

This notion of spiritual aliyah makes our frequent, or even infrequent, visits to Israel that much more meaningful. We aren't just tourists, we're spiritual pilgrims. It conceptualizes and frames every letter to the editor, every trip to the wine store to counter-protest against boycotts, and every choice of Israel for winter break over Cancun, as well as dancing with an Israeli flag at a rally or supporting a candidate for a Birthright trip.

Each act is a soul-driven aliyah that may or may not lead to settling in the land, but it is a "going up" all the same.

There are many texts in rabbinic sources that point toward making physical aliyah. However, the talmudic and medieval rabbis living under oppressive regimes could never have imagined the kind of flowering, Jewishly vibrant Diaspora that we live in today in North America. For us, spiritual aliyah may be a way of acknowledging that we have two children – without having to choose which one we love better.

Thus I share with you the news that I will be taking a year's leave of absence for an aliyat hanefesh in Israel, together with my husband and our three sons, from July 2009 to July 2010. We will be studying, teaching, writing, volunteering, and experiencing. In my absence, Kolel in Toronto will be fully functioning with its signature courses and events under the guidance of Sharoni Sibony at the exciting new Prosserman JCC-Gales Family Pavilion.

Sharoni comes with a wealth of educational programming experience from Limmud, and enthusiasm from having been a Kolel student herself. I will be returning to Toronto in September to lead Kolel's High Holiday services on both Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. I will keep in touch via a monthly blog at www.kolel.org. I will also continue to write this monthly column for The CJN, and I'll be leading two Kolel Israel educational expeditions: Women's Inward Bound, Nov. 15 to 23, and Hidden Gems of Israel, April 18 to 27, 2010. I'll be back in September 2010 in time to lead High Holiday services once again and to continue to help sustain Toronto's Jewish community.

If you're inspired to make an aliyat hanefesh in the coming year, please get in touch with me. In the meantime, let's think about ways to spiritually "go up" while still living in Canada.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Berlin

The ghosts of the past linger in Berlin as in few other major cities in Europe. Berlin, the grand capital of a democratic republic that is commemorating its 60th anniversary this year, has soberly come to terms with its Nazi legacy as it acknowledges the Holocaust through memorials, museums and plaques, and pays homage to that segment of its Jewish population that was mercilessly killed by the Nazi regime.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

I spent a day exploring the Jewish and formerly Nazi dimensions of Berlin, which was home to 160,000 Jews on the eve of Adolf Hitler's accession to power in January 1933. My guide was Carolyn Gammon, a Canadian who works as a guide for Milk & Honey Tours (www.milkandhoneytours.com).

One of the first places we visited was the leafy, upscale neighbourhood of Grunewald, where a simple stone monument marks the spot on Koenigsallee where Walther Rathenau – the foreign minister of Weimar Germany, a founder of the German Democratic Party and the son of the founder of an industrial conglomerate – was assassinated on June 24, 1922. Rathenau, a Jew, was gunned down by three armed men as he was driving from his villa to his office. The lemon-coloured house where he lived from 1910 onward is now used by a publishing company, and is directly across the street from Turkey's embassy.

The assassins, right-wing German nationalists imbued with anti-Semitism, were infuriated that Rathenau, as minister of reconstruction in 1921, had insisted that Germany was duty bound to fulfil its obligations under the 1919 Treaty of Versailles, and that, as foreign minister, he had signed the 1922 Treaty of Rapallo, which normalized German-Soviet relations.

Rathenau's murder disturbed a German-born Jewish scientist named Albert Einstein, who regarded it as an unmistakable sign of the rising tide of anti-Semitism in Germany. To no one's surprise, the Nazi regime hailed the murderers as national heroes and designated June 24 as a holiday.

The marker in Rathenau's memory is close to Israel's embassy – a modern, fenced-in building partially sheathed in Jerusalem stone – on Auguste-Viktoriastrasse. It, in turn, is around the corner from Track 17, the railway siding from which 55,000 Jewish residents of Berlin were deported to Nazi-occupied Poland in 186 transports from October 1941 to February 1945. As I walked along the ramp, I looked down at metal plates embossed with the dates and sizes of the doomed transports.

Prior to visiting Track 17, which was established as a memorial in 1998, I paused at a building at 10 Meinckestrasse, where the Jewish Agency – a quasi-governmental body of the Jewish community in Palestine – was located in the 1930s. The white plaque on it says that the Jewish Agency helped about 50,000 German Jews to emigrate. In fact, 90,000 Berlin Jews managed to leave before the gates were slammed shut on Oct. 23, 1941. Still others committed suicide in despair, while 1,500 survived as "submarines" in hiding. (There are 15,000 Jews in Berlin today, mainly from the former Soviet Union).

Many of the deportees were first detained in the Jewish Home for the Aging on Grosse Hamburgerstrasse, in Berlin's once-dilapidated but now trendy Scheunenviertel neighbourhood. A plain memorial tablet reminds visitors of the deportations.

Berlin's oldest Jewish cemetery, the Alter Judischer Friedhof, established in 1672, is nearby. The Gestapo desecrated the gravestones in 1942, leaving a few broken ones. The municipality turned the cemetery into a park after World War II. Only one headstone remains, and it was erected in 1990 in honour of Moses Mendelssohn (1729-1786), the philosopher and grandfather of the composer Felix Mendelssohn.

The Scheunenviertel, or barn district, attracted newly arrived Jews from Poland in the 19th century. Prior to World War II, it was a slum, but these days, particularly around the funky Hackescher Markt, it is full of smart shops and boutiques in a labyrinth of courtyards filled with art galleries, cafés, bars and restaurants. I went into Levy's, a shop on 40 Rosenthalerstrasse brimming with books, toys and Judaica. I picked up two books, the first containing a list of every deported Berlin Jew and the second listing the names of Berlin's Jewish residents in 1931.

I also wandered into the adjacent Otto Weidt Museum, which tells the story of a largely unknown rescuer. Oskar Schindler's rescue of Jews has been told and retold in books and films, yet the saga of Otto Weidt (1883-1947), a Berliner who saved mainly blind and deaf Jews working in his brush and broom factory, is largely clouded in obscurity, notwithstanding his recognition by Yad Vashem as a Righteous Gentile.

The museum, housed in Weidt's drab original workshop, is funded by the federal government, the city of Berlin and the European Union. It contains photographs, testimonies from those he protected or tried to protect, as well as artifacts from the period.

In this section of Berlin, on Rosenstrasse, is a parkette with red sandstone sculptures of protesting and mourning women. They commemorate a virtually unique incident in the annals of Nazi Germany. During the winter of 1943, following Germany's defeat in the Battle of Stalingrad, the Gestapo arrested about 1,800 Jewish men, almost all of whom were married to Christians. Before they could be deported, their wives and relatives mounted a non-violent protest. The men were released, as were Jews already sent to Auschwitz.

The Rosenstrasse incident is historically significant because it was one of the only examples of civil disobedience to Nazi policy. The sculptures, the Block of Women, were made by Ingeborg Hunzinger and placed here, not far from the actual protest, in 1995.

Another memorial worth visiting is on Levetozowstrasse, the site of a Reform synagogue that the Nazis destroyed on Kristallnacht. The Holocaust is recalled through a stylized freight car, a stele engraved with the names of concentration camps to which Jews were dispatched, and metal plates flush with the ground that list the synagogues of Berlin targeted by Hitler's National Socialist regime.

One more reminder of Nazi crimes is in Berlin's sedate Bavarian quarter. There, affixed to some 200 poles, are signs with inscriptions attesting to the meticulous Nazi campaign against Jews.

Much of it was conceived and planned at Gestapo and SS headquarters on Prinz-Albrechtstrasse. The buildings were severely damaged or obliterated by Allied bombing raids in 1945. After the war, the ruins were demolished, so that nothing remained.

But in the 1970s and 1880s, the site was gradually rediscovered through excavations. In 1987, when Berlin marked its 750th anniversary, it was converted into an outdoor memorial and museum, known as Topography of Terror. Consisting largely of photographs from that ugly era, as well as SS torture chambers, the site will be housed in a museum currently under construction.

The Nazi Reich chancellery on Wilhelmstrasse is gone, too, having been replaced by non-descript apartment blocks. Hermann Goring's air force building has been taken over the finance ministry, while Joseph Goebbels' propaganda ministry has been appropriated by the ministry of labour and social security.

Hitler's bunker, just south of the Brandenburg Gate, was long ago sealed off and paved over with a prosaic parking lot on Gertrud-Kolmarstrasse.

Ironically, the stark Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe, consisting of 2,711 concrete steles and a museum, and opened in 2005, is just a few steps away.

Hitler must surely be spinning in hell.

Sefer Torah dedicated in Rothschild's honour

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

Kurt Rothschild's attention and whole-hearted commitment to the Jewish community is the same kind of attention a scribe exhibits when he writes, with care and precision, the more than half a million letters in a sefer Torah.

Rothschild was recently honoured with a sefer Torah dedicated in his name at Toras Emes Congregation in Toronto. Friends, colleagues and admirers gathered at the shul on June 7 to pay tribute to Rothschild and celebrate his charitable nature and passion for Jewish causes.

The scroll, which was written in Israel and brought to Toronto for the dedication, will be returned to its homeland and placed in a newly constructed synagogue in the Negev region.

"This is a special day," said Solly Sacks, executive director of Mizrachi, a religious Zionist movement that organized the event. "There is nobody better that I could choose, nobody who cares more for Am Yisrael, than Kurt. We want to praise Kurt, who has been serving us for so many years."

Rabbi Daniel Herskowitz, Israel's science and technology minister, said that Rothschild has "always had room in his heart and doings for Am Yisrael and Torat Yisrael… He has served as a role model for all of us."

The sefer Torah will be returned to former Jewish residents of the Gaza Strip. The majority of the 8,000 people who were evacuated from settlements in Gaza in 2005 lived in temporary accommodation until a new neighbourhood was built for them in the Negev's Chalutza Desert.

"These people have relived a modern-day history of Jewish affliction," said Sacks. "They lost everything overnight. This sefer Torah [that will belong to the first shul in Chalutza] is a testament to the spirit of Jewish revival and survival. It will bring joy and hope to the community."

Rothschild said he is "deeply appreciative" to be associated with this mitzvah. "I am proud of the Toronto Jewish community for making the Negev Desert bloom."

He said his work in the community has been motivated by "the debt he owes to the heroes of Jewish history" and that his goals and aspirations date back to his youth.

Rothschild was born in Cologne, Germany, and raised in a modern Orthodox family. He said that the Jewish education he received as a child in religious day schools has guided him through his life's journey.

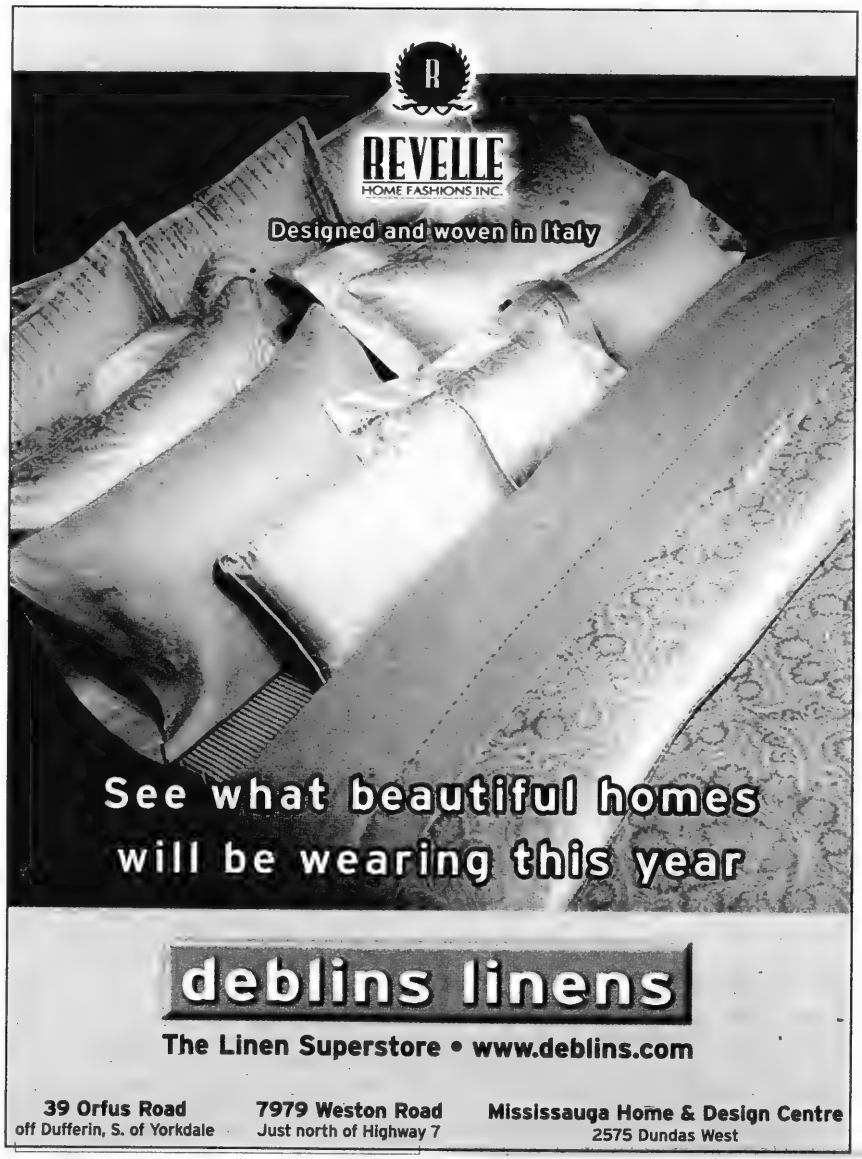
Rothschild escaped from the European inferno before the outbreak of war, and although he did not experience the cruelties of the extermination camps, he said being part of the Holocaust generation has pushed him to commit himself to the needs of his fellow Jews.

In May 1940, Rothschild was interned along with several thousand other German Jews and sent to Canada. After spending two years behind barbwire, Rothschild was released from the internment camp and came to Canada to study engineering at Queen's University in Kingston, Ont. He went on to found a national electrical and mechanical contracting group that was engaged in industrial and commercial construction.

In 1987, Rothschild retired from business to shift all of his attention toward the Jewish community in Canada, Israel and the United States. He is currently world chairman of the Mizrachi Movement and sits on the boards of Bar-Ilan University in Israel, Yeshiva University in New York, Shaare Zedek Hospital, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and United Israel Appeal of Toronto.

To safeguard and promote Jewish continuity, Rothschild said the funding of Jewish education is first and foremost on his list of obligations. He said Jewish youth must be taught the ethics of Torah in order to carry on its traditions and pass them from generation to generation.

He and his wife, Edith, have three children, 21 grandchildren and 12 great-grandchildren.



Archives sets up Speisman bursary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) has established a bursary in memory of Stephen Speisman, its founding director, to assist graduate students and other researchers whose work requires the use of its archival records.

Speisman founded the archives in 1973 and served as director through 1999 before leaving to become executive director of Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park/Pardes Shalom Cemetery.

He retired from Pardes Shalom in May 2008, following a prolonged medical leave of absence after undergoing surgery for cancer. He died last October of a heart attack.

The new bursary will provide an annual grant of up to $500 to assist one or more researchers with some of the costs of research at the OJA, including travel and photocopying. It's funded by Pardes Shalom, which has made a 10-year commitment to the project, as well as by the Ontario Association of Cemetery and Funeral Professionals.

Stephen Speisman

The bursary will be awarded for the first time this October, to coincide with Speisman's first yahrzeit. The application deadline is Aug. 31.

Archives director Ellen Scheinberg suggested at an OJA board meeting that a bursary would be a fitting tribute, because Speisman's "commitment to scholarship and research was of primary importance to him," she told The CJN.

The archives has never provided a bursary before.

"Not that many institutions in the archival community have bursaries," Scheinberg said. "It's very rare. Across the country, there are probably just a handful that are named for someone."

Bill Draimin, president of Pardes Shalom, told The CJN, "We wanted to play a material role in honouring his memory," explaining why the initiative appealed when the OJA approached his organization. "Stephen's contribution to the community throughout his life warranted special recognition."

On a personal note, he added that Speisman had interviewed his grandmother, Bertha Draimin, who was in her 90s at the time, for his book, The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937. The book was a winner of the 1980 City of Toronto Book Award.

Leila Speisman, a CJN staff member, recalls that her late husband travelled to Boston and Ottawa to research his PhD thesis – the basis for his book – in the early 1970s.

"He was certainly conscious that he was lucky [in having received grants to fund his research], and he was conscious, too, that awards like that have been cut back."

Recently, the OJA created a Stephen Speisman fonds, a collection of his personal research materials, presentations and photographs.

Scheinberg said the archives usually serves one or two researchers a week, "primarily historians and graduate students."

If they are doing in-depth research, they need to visit the archives personally, she added, explaining why they may need to travel.

"We can send scanned images of photos, and even small numbers of documents, but if they're delving into collections, they really need to be on site."

While current funding will ensure the bursary is viable for the next 11 years, Scheinberg – who recalls Speisman as "a fountain of information" and "very helpful" – said that community members should "consider making a donation so we can keep the bursary running 20 to 25 years or longer, because that would be a most fitting tribute for Steve. He was the director for close to 30 years."

Further information about the bursary is available at http://www.ontariojewisharchives.org/speismanbursary.htm.

TZEDAKAH PROJECT:

Girls at Leo Baeck Day School's Holy Blossom campus spent many lunch hours in the art studio, beading bracelets and necklaces to sell as a tzedakah project. After a successful sale, the girls donated more than $1,000 to Safehaven Community Living, which offers residential programs for children and young adults with multiple disabilities or complex medical needs. Pictured, from left, are Tyler Jane Robins, Hannah White, Bev Gordon from Safehaven, and Jessica Katzman.

Couple fought for Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

Naim and Adina Nissan, a couple who fought for Israel with courage and devotion, received the Heritage Award at Chabad's recent Gala Spirit of Community Dinner.

More than 800 people attended the June 3 dinner, held at the Riviera Parque Banquet Hall in Vaughan, Ont. The event was a fundraiser for the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre

Rabbi Israel Landa, Chabad's executive director, presented the award to the Nissans.

In a moving video presentation, guests at the dinner learned that Naim Nissan travelled to Israel by bus and by foot, entering the country secretly during the British Mandate years. In the 1940s Adina, as a schoolgirl, enlisted in the Irgun, eventually becoming a commander. "I used to slip out of Jerusalem after curfew dressed in a disguise, to travel the dangerous route to Tel Aviv and deliver information to my comrades," she said.

The Nissans went on to run successful hotels and restaurants. They lived in England for a time, eventually settling in Canada.

The Nissans have always excelled at giving to others, and their exceptional acts of goodness and kindness have served as an example to the next generation, as both of their children are active in the community.

At the dinner, the Nissans shared the stage with two other guests of honour: Vaughan councillor Sandra Yeung Racco, who received the Community Service Award, and Francine Shefman, who accepted the Community Spirit Award on behalf of her husband, Vaughan councillor Alan Shefman.

An auction raised funds for the Beth Chabad Chabad Israeli Community Centre. The cornerstone plaque for the new building was auctioned for $20,000, and the groundbreaking ceremony takes place on June 21.

The guest speaker at the dinner, Rabbi Dov Greenberg from the Stanford University Jewish Centre, spoke about transforming challenges and hardships into opportunities to give to others.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

By RABBI MARTIN LOCKSHIN

A stubborn, stiff-necked people?

This week's Torah portion centres around the story of the scouts Moses sent to spy out the land of Canaan before the Israelites' arrival there. According to Rashi (Rabbi Solomon, son of Isaac, 11th-century France), the pre-eminent Jewish Bible interpreter, this story should be read as a cautionary tale about faithlessness. Sending spies was a bad idea, a result of our ancestors' lack of faith. They should have trusted in God that all would be well.

On a simple reading of the text, Rashi's interpretation seems like a stretch for a few reasons, especially since the opening verse of the story (Numbers 14:1) suggests that the whole idea of spies was God's. But Jewish tradition has shown an amazingly strong loyalty to Rashi's Bible interpretations, beginning right after his death, and perhaps even before. Many of the explanations offered by Rashi have become so ingrained in the Jewish reading of the Bible that it's difficult for traditional Jews to look at the text of the Bible any other way.

But there have been pious Jews over the years who have boldly gone back to the words of the Bible and interpreted them anew. One of the most creative medieval rabbis to write a Bible commentary that was radically different from Rashi's was Rashi's own grandson, Rashbam (Rabbi Samuel, son of Meir and of Yocheved, Rashi's oldest daughter, 12th-century France).

Rashbam explains that the Israelites were perfectly justified in wanting spies to scout out the land. "They were confident that God would give them the land of Canaan," Rashbam writes, but they had no reason to think that they would get the land "without effort," and they hoped to learn from the spies "how they should wage war" against the Canaanites.

One difference between Rashi and Rashbam is that Rashi seems to promote passive faith, while Rashbam feels that faith and human effort can go hand in hand.

But the difference goes well beyond that. While the Torah itself says that the Israelites in the wilderness were stubborn and stick-necked, Rashi consistently portrays the Israelites in an even more negative light. For example, in Numbers 11, the Bible states that the Israelites complained about the food they ate in the desert. Rashi reads the story as describing how ungrateful and malevolent the Israelites were. According to Rashi, they had just experienced an amazing miracle and they were simply looking for any pretext to complain, since their goal was to get God angry.

Rashbam, on the other hand, explains the biblical context of the complaining totally differently. The people, according to Rashbam's reading, had just been asked to travel for three days straight without setting up camp. Understandably, they complained.

Later in that same chapter, Rashi says the Israelites spoke ill about the manna even though, as the Bible says (according to Rashi's understanding), it was a perfect, miraculous food. Rashbam says that the Bible itself explains that the people complained because the manna truly was not esthetically pleasing: "It looked dry and hard."

So what is the Bible teaching us about our ancestors in the wilderness – that they were stiff-necked ornery complainers or that they actually had things to complain about? Reasonable people might argue about which interpretation – Rashi's or Rashbam's – fits the words of the Bible better.

But it seems to me that Rashbam's approach ought to be required reading for rabbis and other leaders of the Jewish people. The lesson should be that when you hear the Jewish people complaining, don't label them as stubborn troublemakers. Look around to see if you can find out what is causing their complaints.

Rabbi Martin Lockshin is rabbi of the Toronto Partnership Minyan. He is the author of an annotated English translation of Rashbam's commentary on the Torah, and a new version of the Hebrew text of Rashbam's commentary, with Hebrew notes and introduction.

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Humility, above all else

As Israel continues its journey through the wilderness, an interesting revolt takes place. Another member of the Levite tribe, Korach, gathers together a group of people to challenge the authority of Moses.

The argument that Korach presents is a personal one. Essentially, he asks: what makes Moses so great? It couldn't be lineage, since Korach is of the same tribe and, therefore, of the same lineage as Moses. It couldn't be communication with God, since Korach claims to have also spoken closely with God. Certainly Korach could pull out a long list of complaints that the People of Israel had raised against Moses during their wilderness journey, since the text reflects an ongoing reality of complaint after complaint directed toward Moses.

Ultimately, the challenge for leadership is forced to the forefront, with a full-blown mutiny on the horizon. Moses must now defend his leadership and argue for his worthiness to hold the prominent position that he holds. One can imagine that mounting an argument in support of Moses' leadership should be an easy thing. In truth, merely stating the fact that God chose Moses as leader should put an end to the discussion, since it's one thing to argue with Moses while quite another to challenge God.

Interestingly, Moses doesn't defend himself, but rather seems shocked into silence. The text reflects that Moses has "fallen upon his face," indicating both shock and shame. To settle the dispute, God steps forward (so to speak) and represents Moses in the challenge. Of course, Korach loses and is discredited, and the text describes the famous incident of the earth opening up and swallowing Korach and his followers.

The question remains: why couldn't Moses respond to Korach, and is that a sign of vulnerability in a leader?

From the moment we meet Moses as an infant, there are many things we don't know about him. We have no sense of how he looked or about any of his preferences in daily life. The only traits we encounter again and again are his humanity and his humility.

It's Moses' humanity that leads him to strike an Egyptian taskmaster and begin a journey of destiny that will help redeem the Jewish people. It's his humility that will begin a relationship with God, which will stand as unique for all time.

Moses' first conversation with God was an argument. At the burning bush, God instructs Moses that he was to lead the Jewish people out of Egypt, and Moses argues with God. The more God expresses commitment to the vision of Moses as a leader, the more Moses argues that he's not equipped for the job. Moses pushes the argument so far that God ultimately shuts it down and unilaterally dictates to Moses that he must accept his fate. This initial argument is the key to our understanding why Moses can't respond to Korach. Korach is merely reinforcing the self-doubt that Moses had expressed in the beginning.

The essence of humility is not to feel that you can't accomplish anything, but to understand that many others in the world can likewise accomplish a task and to believe that they can probably do it better. Humility creates the space in which other people's accomplishments and strengths can exist. When there is humility, there is room for others. Moses showed us that with great humility comes greater room for the presence of God in our lives.

The Talmud states that Psalms teaches us how God can't endure someone of proud heart. Rabbi Hisda says not to pronounce the word as oto (him), but ito (with him). It's not that God can't endure someone of proud heart because of his pride, but rather that a proud heart has filled the entire space, leaving no room within which God can reside.

Jewish Life

The Dead Sea Scrolls and me

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

For almost half a decade, I was involved in the effort to bring the Dead Sea Scrolls to Toronto.

Now I find it hard to believe that I was fortunate enough to have helped to bring the scrolls to the city. They will be on exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum from June 27 to Jan. 3, 2010.

For me, it was a personal odyssey that started when as a young boy I lived in Israel and became enamoured of my people's fascinating history. It was a fascination that would become an avocation when I began my formal study of history. It would also lead me into the field of archeology, especially the elucidation of our biblical past. Although the term biblical archeology is no longer fashionable in academic circles, it continues to hold me captive.

It was just about 30 years ago that I had the opportunity to combine my two loves, in a series that I was doing for CBC Radio's documentary program, Ideas. Needless to say, the Dead Sea Scrolls were featured prominently.

I was fortunate enough to have interviewed Yigael Yadin, a man who personified the term biblical archeology for the series and who played a major role in the ongoing saga of the scrolls. He was already a legend by this time.

As a young man, Yadin was the chief of staff of the Haganah during the 1948 War of Independence. Yadin's father, Eliezer Sukenik, was the first director of the Institute of Archaeology at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Sukenik was one of the first scholars to see the scrolls and to recognize their importance. This happened around Nov. 29, 1947, the date on which the United Nations voted for the partition of Palestine and the creation of a Jewish state.

The fact that the scrolls reappeared after almost 2,000 years to bear witness to the birth of a new Jewish state has been likened to a modern miracle. Sukenik even managed to secure a batch of the scrolls for Israel but could not get enough money to purchase the entire lot. Sadly, Sukenik had to let some of them go, but fortunately his son, Yadin, caught up with the batch in New York through an ad in, of all places, the Wall Street Journal.

Yadin told me that by then he had his PhD in archeology, and his dissertation was on the War of the Sons of Light Against the Sons of Darkness, one of the scrolls his father had acquired for Israel. Through delicate negotiation, as well as wheeling and dealing, Yadin managed to get the scrolls for Israel.

But Yadin's connection with the scrolls did not end then. He told me the story of how, when he was on sabbatical in London in 1961 and preparing to lead the excavations on Masada, someone sent him a fragment of a much larger scroll for which he paid $10,000. Then he lost contact with his go-between. Interestingly, while excavating Masada from 1963 to 1965, Yadin found fragments of scrolls corresponding to those that had been found at Qumran.

Eventually, Yadin caught up with the rest of the scroll for which he had paid $10,000. This happened in 1967 during the Six Day War, when he was an adviser to the then-chief of staff, Yitzhak Rabin. As Jerusalem was being taken from the Jordanians, Rabin allowed Yadin to take a patrol to the house of a man known as Kando, who lived in east Jerusalem.

Kando had acted as a go-between for the initial scroll discovery in 1947. Yadin found an enormous document more than 30 feet long, whose top third had decomposed during its burial for almost 20 years, underneath the floorboards of Kando's porch.

Yadin would call this hitherto unknown document the Temple Scroll. He told me that it was unlike any other of the scrolls that had been discovered previously. In it, God talks in the first person, giving instructions on how to build the Temple. It would take Yadin 10 years to study and publish it, which he did in 1977.

Yadin's enthusiasm for the scrolls was infectious. Even though he died in 1984, his enthusiasm inspired me to try to bring the scrolls to Toronto. It was but another example in my life of the Past moving Forward toward the future.

The Jewish Highway

Albert von Tilzer will be loved forever for composing the melody to "Take Me Out to the Ball Game." And like many of the game's greats, von Tilzer (originally Gumm or Gumbinsky) was Jewish. [tinyurl.com/bbll09]

Baseball lover Paul Roitman Bardack has written a great essay that traces what started off as a somewhat ambiguous relationship between Jews and the game – and has since turned into a full-fledged passion. Lipman Emanuel Pike didn't hide his Jewishness when he became the first Jewish player in the mid-19th century. But Pike was followed by a clutch of players who took great pains to hide their religious affiliation, including Philip Clarence (Cohen) Cooney, Henry (Lipschitz) Bostick and Joseph (Rosebloom) Bennett. [tinyurl.com/bbll12]

I prefer the approach taken by Al Schacht, pitcher for the Washington Senators in 1919 and better known as the Clown Prince of Baseball. "There is talk that I am Jewish – just because my father was Jewish, my mother is Jewish, I speak Yiddish and once studied to be a rabbi and a cantor. Well, that's how rumours get started." [tinyurl.com/bbll23]

Sandy Koufax, of course, made no bones about his heritage. Koufax didn't pitch for his Los Angeles Dodgers in the first game of the 1965 World Series against the Minnesota Twins because it was Yom Kippur. Sandor Slomovits captures the pride felt by every Jewish baseball-loving fan at the time in his article Yom Kippur and Sandy Koufax: They'll Always Go Together. [tinyurl.com/bbll14] Stay at the JewishSports website for several great baseball articles, including a look at how Jews made baseball "Our Own," and a review of Aviva Kemper's documentary, The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg. [tinyurl. com/bbll15]

And now, a home run of Jewish baseball treats!

• Fans can download Prof. Eric Solomon's essay "Jews and Baseball: A Cultural Love Story," in which he argues that the game has played a crucial role in the evolution of Jewish society. [tinyurl.com/bbll16]

• After that, you can read online, the entire book, Jewish Baseball Stars (New York: Hippocrene Books) by Harold U. Ribalow and Meir Z. Ribalow. [tinyurl.com/bbll27]

• Visit the archives of The Forward, which has been documenting Jews and the game for years. [tinyurl.com/bbll19]

• Want more? How about profiles of 189 Jewish baseball players – from Cal (Abie) Abrams to Eddie Zosky. [tinyurl.com/bbll18] Most sites take an inclusive stance when including players on their "Jewish" lists. I presume that most don't want to engage in a "Who Is a Jew(ish baseball player)" debate.

With the popularity of baseball and Jews on this side of the Atlantic, how have things fared in the Holy Land? On the amateur level, the Israel Association of Baseball has been around since 1986 and according to its website oversees 70 teams: "Religious and [haredi] youth, secular children, boys, girls, rich and poor, kibbutz children, city dwellers, Jews, Christians and Arabs all play together on the same field and very often on the same team." [tinyurl.com/bbll20]

A couple of seasons ago, there were great hopes for the nascent Israel Baseball League. You can read all about its ignominious end. [tinyurl.com/bbll24]

But plans are underway to relaunch the game with the help of Marvin Goldklang, a part-owner of the New York Yankees and principal owner of several minor league teams. [tinyurl.com/bbll25]

Before closing, let's salute the game one more time as Mandy Patinkin sings a geshmakt Yiddish double-header of Take Me Out to the Ball Game and God Bless America. [tinyurl.com/bbll21]

Vayls'iz eyns, tsvey, dray strikes, un oys (For it's one, two, three strikes you're out)

Bay der beysball shpil. (At the old ballgame.)

Shpil ball! (Play ball!)

Toronto man takes part in Kids Cancer Ride

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

After logging more than 5,000 kilometres over the course of three months, cycling five to six hours a day five days a week, David Sugarman is finally on his way.

The 40-year-old Toronto resident is participating in one of country's most gruelling fundraisers. He's one of 36 people who was selected to participate in this year's Sears National Kids Cancer Ride, the longest charity ride in the world.

The cyclists, who hail from all parts of Canada, are crossing the country on two wheels with the goal of raising $2 million for 17 Canadian pediatric oncology centres. They left Vancouver on June 13 and will be arriving in Halifax on June 25.

"A hundred per cent of the money raised is going directly to charity," Sugarman told The CJN about a week before the ride began. "That's one of the things that attracted me to the cause."

Participants had to raise a minimum of $25,000 – he raised $30,000 – as well as pay $4,000 to cover the cost of the trip, he said.

Sugarman, the father of a four-year-old daughter, had no previous connection to childhood cancer. "I can't imagine what it's like for the families with children who have cancer. About 2,000 children are diagnosed with cancer every year."

Describing himself as a sports generalist, Sugarman said he decided to apply for the gruelling charity ride at a point in his life when he had extra time to devote to the project. He is the former president of Billy Bee Honey, a company he recently sold.

"I heard about this great charity. I thought, 'I have the time.' I realized this was a good way to give back to the community.

"I thought it would be a terrific challenge. It became a full-time job."

Sugarman has also been helping his wife, Laurin Mayer, run justforme.com, a company that creates personalized CDs for children.

He said he had done recreational cycling in the range of 20 to 40 kilometres before embarking on the Sears ride training program. He began with 300 kilometres in the initial week in March. By mid-May, he was logging 600 kilometres a week, with 250-kilometre-rides in the end to build up endurance for the cross-country trip.

He said the Sears group will cover 250 to 300 kilometres a day. "Most nights we'll be sleeping in an RV."

Sugarman said that to keep up his energy, he's been consuming from 7,000 to 8,000 calories a day. "It's all about maintaining the weight. I'm on the thin side, so I have to be extra careful."

The riders are being followed by a group of 12 professionals, including a bike technician. "We'll be surrounded by support vehicles on all the major highways."

They visited hospitals and Sears stores to raise awareness and funds for children's cancer, he said, noting that in major cities, people are invited to join the cyclists for a ride-along.

Sugarman said he's in a very fortunate position. "When someone has the time, there is nothing more fulfilling or important than giving back to the community. I'm lucky to be able to do this."

Ottawa pledges funding for swine flu research

Compiled by CJN Staff

In response to the swine flu outbreak, Ottawa will fund a national influenza research network focused on evaluating a vaccine to fight a potential pandemic, Health Minister Leona Aglukkaq announced.

The network will strengthen Canada's capacity to evaluate the safety and effectiveness of a pandemic influenza vaccine and vaccination programs, Aglukkaq said June 5.

The initiative is a partnership between the Canadian Institutes of Health Research (CIHR), the federal agency for health research, and the Public Health Agency of Canada (PHAC), Ottawa's public health arm. It will be led by Dr. Scott Halperin, director of the Canadian Centre for Vaccinology in Halifax, and will link more than 80 scientists from 30 research and public health institutions across the country.

The network will provide a pan-Canadian co-ordinating mechanism for conducting applied public health research that will help governments and the public health community prepare for, and respond quickly to, an influenza pandemic.

Obituary

Fought for women's equality

She put family first, which wasn't easy, given the long hours she devoted to her public life, he said. She was "a mother to more than four boys. She was a mother to a generation of men and women."

Though she is most associated with fighting for women's equality, she was not a true feminist, he said, because "her core value was humanity, not gender: she believed in work and effort, not entitlement."

Former prime minister Paul Martin, who attended the funeral, told reporters that Finestone offered him advice from the time he was a rookie MP to his retirement. "She never shrank from giving me advice, even when I was in cabinet, and I always took it… she certainly had the right balance. She had a very strong social conscience, but would also say, 'You've got to balance the books.'"

He added: "She did enormous good for the country, and Canada is poorer for her passing."

Finestone was the Liberal member of Parliament for Mount Royal riding from 1984 to 1999. The riding, which at the time had probably the largest Jewish population in the country, had been held since 1965 by former prime minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who retired in 1984. Finestone admired Trudeau and has said he inspired her to go into politics.

She had to fight for the party nomination in 1984 against two other contenders, both from the Jewish community.

She was secretary of state for multiculturalism and the status of women under prime minister Jean Chrétien from 1993 to 1996, and she served on dozens of committees over her time in Parliament. In 1999, Chrétien appointed Finestone to the Senate, where she served until her mandatory retirement seven years ago.

She also worked for women's rights at the international level, attending the UN World Conference on Women in Nairobi and leading the Canadian delegation to Beijing in 1995.

Finestone was the daughter of a prominent Montreal Jewish family, and came by community service naturally. Her father was Monroe Abbey, president of Canadian Jewish Congress from 1968 to 1971, and her mother was the former Minnie Cummings.

From an early age, Finestone volunteered in the Jewish community, including serving as president of the Women's Federation of Allied Jewish Community Services (now Federation CJA), and was a founder of Project Genesis, a storefront agency helping people in need secure their rights in the 1970s and of the francophone Centre Communautaire Juif in the 1960s.

She worked professionally in Jewish Family Services' youth protection department, just before entering politics.

Her interest in women's and human rights in general led her to activism in the broader society. She was the first anglophone (and Jewish) president of the Féderation des Femmes du Québec, the province's largest women's organization. She was elected in 1977. Back then, she said in an interview with The CJN: "I've always been a groundbreaker in many ways. There's a little of the avant-gardist in me."

She was behind the famous pro-federalist "Yvette" rally of thousands of women during the 1980 referendum on sovereignty, a protest against a derisive remark by Parti Québécois cabinet minister Lise Payette about women on the "no" side. Some observers felt the event, held at the old Montreal Forum, help turn the tide against separatism.

The eulogy was delivered by Rabbi Wilfred Shuchat, rabbi emeritus of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, who officiated 62 years ago to the day at the wedding of Sheila and her husband, Alan, who predeceased her.

Tributes to Finestone have been numerous. Liberal Leader Michael Ignatieff stated: "Dedicating a large part of her life to public service, she fought to better the lives of the less fortunate… Ms. Finestone's tireless devotion and compassion for others stemmed from her belief that 'living in society goes beyond caring about yourself.' Her exemplary commitment to helping her community was an inspiration to us all."

Irwin Cotler, who followed in Finestone's footsteps as Mount Royal MP, said in the House of Commons that she "knew every quartier of this increasingly multicultural constituency."

$100,000 for Manitoba-Israel wetlands research

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A $100,000 provincial grant will support collaborative Manitoba-Israel research into wetlands and watersheds.

"Israel is a country that knows how to use and conserve water well, and we intend to learn from it," Manitoba Premier Gary Doer told The CJN.

The grant announcement was made June 4 simultaneously with an announcement that the second Manitoba-Israel Water Experts Symposium will take place in Israel in January 2010, by invitation of Keren Kayemeth LeIsrael and its Canadian counterpart, the Jewish National Fund of Canada. The first symposium was held in Winnipeg in August 2008.

Israel's experience in reconstructing wetlands could serve as a model for Manitoba, given that restoration of wetlands is a "pillar of our provincial water plan," Manitoba's minister of water stewardship, Christine Melnick, told The CJN.

She noted that Israel has had experience in "restoring a large wetland, the Hula Valley, and the Jewish National Fund is currently working on plans to restore a large wetland in the Negev.

"This [research grant] is especially important for Manitoba as we move forward to restore and protect our wetlands, including the large Delta and Netley/Libau marshes on the southern shores of Lake Manitoba and Lake Winnipeg," said Melnick, who has been to Israel three times.

"Israel has a long history of successfully managing many unique water quality and water supply issues throughout its history," said Miriam Ziv, Israel's ambassador to Canada, who was in Winnipeg for the announcements. "The partnership with Manitoba will be of great benefit to both jurisdictions," she added.

The grant will go to the International Institute for Sustainable Development, whose head office is in Winnipeg, and the Galilee Technology Centre in Israel, to implement a joint project developed from collaboration between scientists from Manitoba and Israel that took place during the first Manitoba-Israel Water Experts Symposium last year.

Christine Melnick

Melnick said that at last summer's symposium, she announced a $100,000 grant "for a research idea coming out of the symposium. We received several proposals and chose this one for its universal application and because it focused on wetlands."

Scientists from Manitoba, Israel and Mexico will work together to establish an Agricultural Wetland/Watershed Research Network. The network will provide an Internet-based forum for researchers around the world whose work focuses on the role and function of wetlands and watershed research in largely agricultural regions.

The site will be designed to serve as a globally credible source of accurate scientific information that can be used by policy-makers and researchers interested in examining issues such as the flow of nutrients and other contaminants, the value of wetlands and their role in providing resiliency to watersheds during times of drought. The site will also provide information on the role of protecting downstream freshwater lakes such as Lake Winnipeg.

Melnick said the project will be useful to the many Manitoba conservation districts engaged in developing watershed management plans and will be consistent with the establishment of a research chair in watershed sciences at the University of Manitoba that was announced in April 2008.

The new grant of $100,000 for collaborative research on wetlands comes on the heels of scholarships totalling $250,000 announced by Melnick in 2008. The scholarships are earmarked for Manitoba students who want to study water resources at an Israeli institution of higher learning of their choice, and then return to work in the province. Scholarships of $25,000 will be given out for 10 years, with each student being eligible to receive the scholarship for up to two consecutive years.

Melnick noted that Manitoba is looking at sending 12 scientists to the upcoming symposium, many of whom were at the first symposium. Participants will likely travel to several locations in Israel, she added.

TORONTO STUDENTS WIN PICTURE CONTEST: Three Toronto Jewish day school students took the top prizes last week in an Israel Government Tourist Office picture contest in May. Students were asked to come up with imagery in celebration of Tel Aviv's 100th anniversary this year, with the winning entry scheduled for use in upcoming promotional advertising for the city. Holding their winning entries are, from left, first-place winner Joely Pulver, a Grade 8 Bialik Hebrew Day School student, second-place winner Maya Hartman, who is in Grade 3 at Toronto Heschel School, and third-place winner Alexandra Khozen, a Grade 6 Associated Hebrew Day School student. For more on the contest, please go to cjnews.com

Private member's bill on Iran will have impact: MP

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Irwin Cotler

MONTREAL — Irwin Cotler conceded that it's next to impossible for the Iran Accountability Act, the private member's bill he tabled in Parliament June 9, to actually be adopted.

But Cotler, the Liberal opposition's special counsel on human rights, said Bill C-412 – intended to hold Iran to account for its genocidal and nuclear ambitions and repression of its people – is already making an impact.

The former justice minister said he is working on getting all-party support for the legislation and hoped it would inspire the government to use it as a model for initiating similar legislation on its own.

"Or if not, at least to be held to account as to why it's not doing so," Cotler said in a phone interview last week.

If the government does nothing, it will be a "standing reminder… that they are not exercising their responsibility," he said.

Cotler held a press conference in Ottawa last week to announce the bill with Liberal MP Ken Dryden and Roya Boroumand, director of a foundation promoting democracy and human rights in Iran.

If adopted, the bill would have Canada divest from Iran, establish a mechanism to monitor incitement there, and keep the most "virulent" inciters from that country from entering Canada, Cotler said.

The bill also would freeze the assets of those helping Iran achieve nuclear capability and enhance its "machinery of hate," use the United Nations and international community to "bring Iran to justice" through principles of international law, and target Iran's dependence on imported petroleum, he said.

"As a signatory of the 1948 Genocide Convention, Canada has a responsibility to prevent and punish incitement to genocide that it has largely ignored in the case of the world's greatest threat," Cotler said in a statement last week.

Bill C-412 "fulfils these responsibilities and affirms Canada as a world leader in fighting impunity."

Cotler told The CJN that the bill has already begun to serve as a "concrete, tangible template" for similar initiatives in the United States and around the world that seek to "expose the dangers of a nuclear, genocidal, rights-violating Iran."

He said the bill was the "organizing theme" of remarks that he delivered last week at a conference of the International Association of Genocide Scholars in Washington.

Cotler discussed the bill with Representative Howard Berman (D-California), chair of the House committee on foreign affairs. Berman is "exploring it in terms of an American initiative," Cotler said.

CHRC offers ideas for change

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) has released an internal report that rejected suggestions it abandon its mandate to act against hate propaganda through Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA).

Instead, it urged Parliament to consider expanding the criminal prosecution of alleged hatemongers by removing safeguards in the Criminal Code that make prosecutions more difficult.

The commission said it must retain the ability to bring remedial action against violators of the CHRA's Section 13, which prohibits repeated electronic dissemination of hate messages that expose a group to hatred or contempt.

"Words and ideas have power," states the report, which was presented to Parliament last week. "That power, while overwhelmingly positive, can also be used to undermine democracy, freedom and equality. It is for this reason that Canada, and many other nations, have enacted laws to limit forms of extreme hateful expression that have very minimal value in the free exchange of ideas, but do great harm to our fellow citizens."

In recent years, the federal commission and its provincial counterparts have come under attack for cases launched against mainstream publications, including Maclean's and the Western Standard magazine.

The Western Standard and its publisher Ezra Levant were brought before the Alberta commission for publishing cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad that had ignited riots around the world. The case was eventually dismissed.

The CHRC asked University of Windsor law professor Richard Moon to analyze the issues surrounding Section 13, and in November 2008, he recommended the section be abandoned.

The commission dismissed that suggestion and instead proposed reforms to improve the CHRA.

Among the proposals:

- add a statutory definition of "hatred" and "contempt" in accordance with that applied by the Supreme Court of Canada in a case involving Nazi agitator John Ross Taylor;
- allow for an award of costs where the complainant abused the adjudication process;
- allow for the early dismissal of complaints;
- end the assessment of fines in successful cases.

The commission also offered suggestions for changes to Criminal Code. It called for an end to the requirement that the provincial attorney general consent to prosecutions and for removal of the defence of truth.

In calling for the end of that defence, the Commission quoted former Ontario deputy attorney general Mark Freiman, who now serves as president of Canadian Jewish Congress. The commission suggested that in a 2006 article, Freiman wrote that the promotion of hatred against a group could never be true.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber took issue with that interpretation, saying Freiman, who was not writing for Congress at the time, only called for clarification of the issue. "Congress has no position on the removal of the truth defence," Farber said.

Congress supports the report's recommendations to reform the Commission. "We are concerned when [Chief Commissioner Jennifer Lynch] goes off the track in dealing with the Criminal Code," he said.

What's more, Congress has advocated that some sort of consent, similar to the one envisioned in the Criminal Code, be required before CHRA cases could proceed, he said.

Levant, one of the commission's severest critics, was scathing in his assessment of the report. "I'm embarrassed for the CHRC," he said. "It's clear they disrespect our Charter [of Rights] and Canadian values of free speech. They just don't get it."

He said the commission is out of step with the vast majority of Canadians, and instead of reining in its powers, it is "doubling down" by calling for fewer safeguards in Criminal Code prosecutions.

"Lynch wants police to have more power to censor Canadians," he said. "Can you imagine living in a country that when you say something that's true you're prosecuted. That's crazy. That's Iran. That's the Soviet Union."

Levant also questioned the commission's contention that people have a "right" to be treated with dignity. "What does that mean?" he asked. "It's such a loosey-goosey, touchy-feely thing. It's not a real right," such as free expression, he said.

Obama distorts in name of diplomacy

New York Times columnist David Brooks is as shrewd and erudite an observer of world affairs as one can hope to find in journalism today. In his June 5 column ("The Chicago View") about U.S. President Barack Obama's Cairo speech, Brooks argued that Obama is a pragmatist, not a rigid ideologue, who tries to combine diplomatic idealism with hard-core political realism.

According to Brooks, in the pursuit of pragmatism in Cairo, Obama took competing Arab and Israeli historical narratives "and tried to create a new narrative that all sides could relate to."

"To construct this new narrative," Brooks continued, "Obama strung together some hard truths, historical distortions, eloquent appeals and strained [better put: illegitimate] moral equivalencies."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The problem is that even given Obama's admirable willingness to speak "some hard truths," his distortions nevertheless made his effort to "construct" a new, shared narrative dubious, even though Brooks didn't see it this way. Brooks defended Obama, saying that the president, after all, is engaged in "diplomacy, not scholarship."

Still, Brooks did cite some critics' complaints about Obama's distortions. For instance, the president compared the plight of the Palestinians to that of former slaves in the American south. This was arguably an unsuccessful attempt to make a point about pursuing only non-violent struggle. There was, unfortunately, no mention of efforts over many years to achieve peace through negotiations between Israel and its Arab neighbours, including the Palestinians.

Nonetheless, never before in an Arab capital had Arab and Muslim audiences listened to a leader speak about the need for them to recognize Israel's legitimacy. Again, critics have pointed out that a central part of that legitimacy is something Obama failed to note – that the Jews have an unbroken historical attachment to the land dating back millennia. However, by focusing solely on the Holocaust as the tragic episode in the Jews' past, he left the impression that the Holocaust is the reason for the existence of the State of Israel, whereas in truth that horror was only a catalyst that accelerated Israel's creation.

To his credit, Obama tried to inculcate the truth about the Holocaust in areas of the world where it is widely denied and where anti-Jewish/anti-Zionist conspiracy theories, including about 9/11, run rampant.

Realistically, there was only so much "truth telling" that could happen on this one special occasion. And this was, as Brooks indicated, an important start.

* * *

While faulting my May 14 column for taking playwright Caryl Churchill's words in "Seven Jewish Children" out of context, Yoni Goldstein (CJN, June 11) wrote that her play "is perhaps the most rational encounter with the frail psyche of an Israeli parent that I have ever seen."

Really? Here's the reaction of Yossi Klein Halevi, a highly respected Israeli writer who cares deeply about reconciliation between Israelis and Palestinians:

"My only reaction is that the play is a lie: As the father of Israeli children, I know no Israeli parent who would speak that way to his/her children. Maybe there are some; maybe some Kachniks. But it is so beyond the pale of Israeli discourse between parents and children, so ludicrous, that that in itself is a form of blood libel. I know some Jews have written in her defence. But the play is so dishonest, so corrupt, that anyone who touches this risks being contaminated with the sin of demonizing the Jews."

Goldstein also faults me for taking his own words (in a National Post column defending the play) out of context – for failing to note that he had written that for Churchill, the link between the Holocaust perpetrated against the Jews "and another, newer, genocide of the Palestinians perpetrated by Israel," is "tenuous at best."

"See the difference?" Goldstein asks. However, he fails to understand that this "difference" is actually irrelevant. One expects a playwright to insinuate explosive ideas, not to declare them baldly. But this "artfulness" in no way lessens their impact. If anything, it only makes noxious ideas more effective, even insidious. In this case, linking Jews/Israelis to Nazis remains a hideous, grotesque lie.

The Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School is a pluralistic and egalitarian SK-Grade 8 school in downtown Toronto. Our Middle School promotes mastery of curriculum content, character development through leadership opportunities, and respect for diversity of Jewish expression and culture.

At first, we didn't think Zareinu was the right place for Jonah...

... but once we learned about the opportunity to be a part of Zareinu's first-ever integrated preschool, we never hesitated to enroll our son. With the help of the wonderful staff and their expertise, Jonah has thrived in a language-rich and nurturing preschool environment, infused with Jewish experiences and traditions.

For twenty years the Zareinu Educational Centre has been devoted to providing quality instructional and therapeutic services in a Jewish context to children with developmental and physical disabilities in the GTA. Here are just some of what Zareinu's has to offer:

Early Intervention
Children at risk under two years of age and their parents spend two mornings a week with some of the most experienced early childhood professionals in the GTA learning how to maximize learning and skill development.

Integrated Preschool
Children up to 4 years old with physical and developmental disabilities play and learn together with typically developing youngsters in an environment which promotes language skills, physical growth, social play skills and yiddishkeit.

Boys' and Girls' Yeshiva
Young adults ages 15-21 spend their mornings deeply involved in Jewish studies and their afternoons learning practical vocational skills both in the classroom and on job sites. This programme is in co-operation with Jewish Vocational Services.

New grants support young Jewish innovators

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Jewish leaders of tomorrow can be thankful for people like Lynn Schusterman.

In 2006, Schusterman founded the Center for Leadership Initiatives (CLI), a Vancouver-based foundation dedicated to developing Jewish leaders and promoting managerial excellence in the Jewish community.

The centre recently allocated more than $400,000 for projects undertaken by the Return on Investment Community (ROI), a global community of young Jewish innovators, also created by Schusterman in 2006, as a partnership between CLI and Taglit-Birthright Israel.

More than half of the funds will be allocated to the ROI innovation fund, which will provide five grants of approximately $50,000 each.

"Preference will be given to projects that support and deploy the existing ROI network of some 400 people," CLI director Yoni Gordis says.

About $80,000 will be allocated to the ROI seed fund, which provides small grants ranging between $2,000 and $10,000 to help members of the ROI community with projects in the start-up phase. In 2009, 40 seed fund grants will be given, as compared to 34 in 2008.

"We have a fairly sophisticated strategy when it comes to working with young leadership, using a mixture of teaching them the skills of running non-profits, horizontal and vertical networking and fiscal support," Gordis says.

"We believe these three ingredients, when put together in the ROI community, are a powerful braid to help people progress to the next step."

The goal, he says, is "to open and lubricate the doors so young leaders can reach the younger generation and actualize their visions. This new innovation grant will take it to a whole new level."

Two Canadians were among those who received ROI grants in recent years: Daniel Rattner, in 2007, for Revival, a one-hour documentary on the history and rebirth of Hebrew, and Julie Schneiderman, in 2006, for her work on the fight against AIDS. Schneiderman did a two-week assessment project in Ethiopia with Canadian and Israeli HIV and urological experts, in order to provide initial training of local staff.

Both Canadian recipients attended the third annual ROI Summit in Jerusalem last year, meeting and networking with other ROI entrepreneurs from all over the world.

Yes, it is unfair

Question. I am a parent with custody of three children. At trial the judge ordered that my spouse pay child support retroactive to the beginning of last year, totalling some $6,000, in addition to monthly ongoing support of about $500. I spent thousands of dollars in legal fees and took a lot of time off work over a two year period to obtain that judgment.

All these payments were to be made automatically through the Ontario Director of the Family Responsibility Office (the FRO). If my spouse fails to pay the Director then the FRO is supposed to enforce the Order. My spouse failed to make the payments, so the FRO suspended his driver's license.

To get his license back, my spouse then made a special arrangement with the FRO. Under this arrangement he has to pay $50 per month towards the $6,000 retroactive child support the judge ordered and towards $2,000 in arrears, so long as he keeps paying the ongoing $500 child support each month.

In short, some bureaucrat at the FRO unilaterally overruled the trial judge's decision, without even notifying me. I was given no opportunity to argue why this $50 payment was unfair. I was told I had no say in the matter. Can anything be done?

Answer. No. The legislation was designed to allow the FRO to give parents who pay child support some "breathing room" when the FRO feels that such arrangements are warranted. However noble the idea, the FRO takes the position that the legislation governing its conduct does not allow it to canvass the views of the recipient of child support before entering into such arrangements.

Given that it is the recipient and his or her children that are the most directly affected by such "deals", the insensitivity of the FRO and their refusal to canvass the views of the recipient in such situations is mind-boggling. These arrangements can sometimes lead to grave injustices. In any event, it should be up to our judiciary to determine when and how such payments are to be structured, not a functionary who does so behind closed doors.

Netanyahu the unifier

By ARI SHAVIT
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Commentary

Benjamin Netanyahu crossed the Rubicon yesterday. In order to serve the country, he abandoned his father's ideological home. The decision to leave that home came at great emotional cost.

The prime minister agonized for 10 days over the text that would redefine him. But in the end, Netanyahu did the right thing. He neither stuttered nor blinked. Instead, he placed the spotlight squarely on one irreplaceable phrase: a demilitarized Palestinian state next to a Jewish State of Israel.

The rhetoric of his speech at Bar-Ilan University on Sunday was right of centre, while its political conclusion was left of centre. But if the truth be told, Netanyahu's message yesterday was one of unity. Netanyahu, who in the past was seen as divisive, yesterday became a unifier of Israel. He put on the table a clear, realistic and precise diplomatic formula that reflects the worldview of the Israeli majority.

No, Netanyahu did not abandon Likud for Meretz. But he laid the ideological basis for the next political big bang. He pulled the rug out from under Kadima leader Tzipi Livni and became former prime minister Ariel Sharon's successor. After Bar-Ilan, Netanyahu defines the centre. The prime minister is now a unifying premier who is trying to reduce the occupation without undermining Israeli security.

Netanyahu's new move is harmful to his political future. If he loses the right without gaining the left and Barack Obama, it could destroy him. But that is precisely why the Bar-Ilan speech was a courageous one. Netanyahu is well aware of the dangers ahead. Yet at the decisive moment, several days ago, he told his worried aides that he would do the right thing, even if it brought about his downfall. In that moment, he proved that he is not a politician but a statesman. He proved that he has matured. At the end of a long and painful labour, he has given birth to his internal truth.

Netanyahu's new truth is not that of Peace Now. Iran is still the greatest existential threat. An armed Palestinian state is also a threat. And the root of the conflict is the Palestinians' refusal to recognize Jewish history, Jewish sovereignty and the Jewish People's right to a state in the Land of Israel. However, this bitter truth is no longer being translated into an insistence on territory and settlements. Instead, it is being translated into two principles whose morality is incontrovertible: recognition of the Jewish state and demilitarization of the Palestinian state.

These two principles have now been laid before the White House. If Obama refuses to accept them, we will all know that we are facing an American president who is no longer committed to the existence of the State of Israel. But if Obama does accept these two principles and grants Israel international guarantees for peace, he will prove himself a genuine peace leader – a leader who will pave the way to the correct, stable solution of two nation-states: a Jewish state and a Palestinian one.

Speech 'scuttles chances for peace,' Mubarak says

By YOAV STERN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's demand in a key speech Sunday that Palestinians recognize Israel as the state of the Jewish people "scuttles the chances for peace," Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said Monday.

Mubarak made the comments in a speech to Egyptian army commandos, the state-run MENA news agency reported.

The president said he had informed Netanyahu of his position, according to which Israeli-Palestinian peace talks must be renewed from the point where they broke off, and that the call for recognition of Israel as a Jewish state would only complicate matters.

"You won't find anyone to answer that call in Egypt, or in any other place," Mubarak was quoted as telling the troops.

In his speech, Netanyahu conditioned the establishment of a Palestinian state on that recognition.

Mubarak added that the problems in the Middle East won't be solved until the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is resolved. "The solution to the crises in the Arab and Muslim world lies in Jerusalem," he said.

Hamas, meanwhile, has dismissed Netanyahu's speech as a "racist" attempt to deny Palestinian national rights.

"[Netanyahu wants] to recognize Palestine as pure Jewish land, denying the Palestinian people any rights in their land," the Palestinian news agency Ma'an on Monday quoted the Islamist group as saying in a statement.

In the address, Netanyahu also vowed that Israel would not build any new West Bank settlements, or expand existing ones, but refused to stop accommodating for their natural growth.

According to Ma'an, the Hamas statement added: "Netanyahu attempted to play with words in order to mislead people, claiming he wants peace.

"However, his racial attitudes when he stipulates that the Palestinians recognize Palestine as land for the Jews, indicate that Netanyahu is a liar when he talks about peace. This speech increased hatred and spitefulness."

On Sunday, an aide to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said that the speech "sabotages" regional peace efforts, due to Netanyahu's refusal to accept an influx of Palestinian refugees into Israel and his unwillingness to compromise on the status of Jerusalem.

"Netanyahu's remarks have sabotaged all initiatives, paralyzed all efforts being made and challenges the Palestinian, Arab and American positions," said Nabil Abu Rudeinah.

Netanyahu pledged in the address that Jerusalem be the undivided capital of Israel and that Palestinian refugees not be allowed into Israel.

"This will not lead to complete and just peace," Abu Rudeinah said. "His remarks are not enough and will not lead to a solution."

"Our main demand is the end of the occupation and finding a fair solution for Palestinian refugees and halting settlements," Abu Rudeinah said. "Other details should be resolved in negotiations."

A senior Palestinian negotiator, meanwhile, called on U.S. President Barack Obama to intervene to force Israel to abide by previous interim agreements that include freezing settlement activity in the West Bank. The alternative, he said, is violence.

"President Obama, the ball is in your court tonight," Saeb Erekat said. "You have the choice tonight. You can treat Netanyahu as a prime minister above the law and… close off the path of peace tonight and set the whole region on the path of violence, chaos, extremism and bloodletting.

"The alternative is to make Netanyahu abide by the 'road map,'" he said, referring to a U.S.-sponsored document under which Israel agreed to freeze settlement activity and Palestinians agreed to rein in militants.

"The peace process has been moving at the speed of a tortoise," Erekat added. "Tonight, Netanyahu has flipped it over on its back."

Islamist extremism, nuclear weapons greatest threat

The prime minister also said Palestinians must accept Israel as a Jewish state, and said the root of the regional conflict is the fact that "even moderate" Palestinian elements refuse to do so.

"When Palestinians are ready to recognize Israel as a Jewish state, we will be ready for a true final settlement," he said.

He emphasized that the Jewish People have been linked to the Land of Israel for more than 3,000 years, and he ruled out the option of granting Palestinian refugees the right to settle within Israeli borders.

Netanyahu said Israel would not negotiate with terrorists who wish to destroy it, and he said Palestinians must choose between the path of peace and Hamas.

The prime minister opened his speech by saying that he formed his new government earlier this year with three major challenges facing Israel: the economic crisis, the Iranian threat and the Mideast peace process.

He stressed that the greatest threat to the world today is the link between Islamist extremism and nuclear weapons.

Netanyahu, who until now had not endorsed U.S. President Barack Obama's goal of Palestinian statehood, used this policy speech as an opportunity to reverse course and try to narrow a rare rift between Israel and its closest ally.

Peres and Barak reportedly pressed Netanyahu to announce in the speech his acceptance of the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan and willingness to recognize a Palestinian state with security limitations.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, himself at loggerheads with Hamas, has said talks with Israel cannot resume until Netanyahu halts settlement construction and accepts a two-state solution.

Netanyahu's declaration of support for limited Palestinian statehood laid bare Palestinian rejectionism, Vice-Premier Moshe Ya'alon said Monday.

"I agree with what was said," Ya'alon, who is also strategic affairs minister, told Army Radio. "I know this reality well. I think there was a very important statement that formulated the internal Israeli consensus in the face of Palestinian rejectionism."

Ya'alon, a former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff who opposed Israel's 2005 pullout from the Gaza Strip, added that the debate over whether Netanyahu had supported a two-state solution before the speech was unnecessary and merely about semantics.

"What did the prime minister say before the speech? 'We don't want to rule them. I am prepared to strengthen them so that they can rule themselves,'" he said.

Netanyahu's address was met with mixed responses from across the political spectrum.

Both Israeli Arab and nationalist political leaders blasted the speech as political spin, while Peres praised it as "strengthening Israel's international position and opening the door to direct peace negotiations."

Iran supreme leader orders probe of vote fraud

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran's state television reported Monday that the supreme leader has ordered an investigation into claims of fraud in last week's presidential election.

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei was said to have ordered the powerful Guardian Council to examine the allegations by pro-reform candidate Mir Hossein Mousavi, who claims there was widespread vote rigging in Friday's election. The government declared President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad the winner in a landslide victory.

It was a turnaround for Iran's most powerful figure, who previously welcomed the results.

The European Union (EU) on Monday said an Iranian probe into alleged election fraud must answer all complaints made by opposition protesters who say the re-election of Ahmadinejad was rigged.

This is a matter that the Iranian authorities must address and investigate, EU foreign ministers said in a statement.

The call came after Khamenei ordered the Guardian Council, a powerful 12-member clerical panel that's a pillar of Iran's theocracy, to look into the charges by Mousavi, who has said he is the rightful winner of Friday's election.

The EU said it was concerned over election fraud allegations and the postelection violence that erupted after the release of results.

Ayatollah Ali Khamenei

It is essential that the aspirations of the Iranian people are achieved through peaceful means and that freedom of expression is respected, the EU ministers said.

EU External Relations Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner said she hopes election authorities will really look into all the complaints of irregularities.

French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner said the probe needs to answer the allegations and protests made by demonstrators.

British Foreign Secretary David Miliband said protests and the crackdown in Iran raised very serious doubts… about the free and fair nature of the elections.

The EU ministers also said they remain open to relaunching talks over Iran's nuclear program with Tehran despite the concerns over the elections.

Mousavi wrote an appeal to the Guardian Council Sunday and also met with Khamenei. He asked the council to annul the result because of alleged irregularities, a charge the Interior Ministry and Ahmadinejad have dismissed.

Mousavi's backers led street protests in Tehran on the weekend, after the election results were announced.

Protests erupted in the capital and elsewhere Saturday when the ministry announced a landslide victory for hardline President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in Friday's election.

The outcome has disconcerted western powers trying to induce the world's fifth-largest oil exporter to curb its nuclear program. U.S. President Barack Obama had urged Iran's leadership "to unclench its fist" for a new start in creating ties.

The European Union urged Iran not to use violence against those protesting the disputed election and urged the authorities to look into complaints of irregularities.

"I have thorough respect for all the Iranian citizens who have shown their discontent and have demonstrated peacefully," Ferrero-Waldner told reporters in Luxembourg. "I do hope that the security forces will refrain from showing violence."

In response to Mousavi's appeal to the Guardian Council, whose chairman, Ayatollah Ahmad Jannati, endorsed Ahmadinejad before the vote, said it would rule within 10 days on two official complaints it had received from Mousavi and another losing candidate, Mohsen Rezaie.

"Mousavi and Rezaie appealed yesterday. After the official announcement [of the appeal], the Guardian Council has seven to 10 days to see if it was a healthy election or not," ISNA news agency quoted council spokesman Abbasali Kadkhodai as saying.

The council vets election candidates and must formally approve results for the outcome to stand. Khamenei has told Iranians to support Ahmadinejad.

On Sunday, Mousavi's supporters handed out leaflets calling for a rally in downtown Tehran on Monday afternoon. The protests on the previous two days were the sharpest show of discontent against the Islamic Republic's leadership in years.

Mousavi urged Iranians on Sunday to keep up nationwide protests "in a peaceful and legal way."

Pro-Mousavi demonstrators threw stones at police at Tehran University on Sunday and clashed with Ahmadinejad supporters on a main avenue that was littered with broken glass and fires.

In the north of the capital, a stronghold of Mousavi backers, riot police patrolled after midnight. Rubbish burned in the street, some cars had their windows broken, and police blocked access to roads.

After dusk, some Mousavi supporters took to rooftops across Tehran calling out "Allahu akbar" (God is greatest), an echo of tactics by protesters in the 1979 Islamic revolution.

U.S. leaders have shown caution in their comments on the election so far, in the hope of keeping alive Obama's strategy of engagement with Iran, with tougher talk coming from Europe.

Germany, one of Iran's biggest trading partners and a negotiator in the West's nuclear talks with Tehran, said it had summoned the Iranian ambassador on Sunday.

Jews expelled from Arab lands press case

JTA

ROME — Jews displaced from Arab lands met in Rome this week to press for the recognition of their rights as forced exiles.

Participants were to present their case Tuesday to the Italian parliament's Foreign Affairs Commission.

"We hope that this will lead to a resolution on the rights of Jews displaced from Arab countries," Stanley Urman, executive vice-president of the group Justice for Jews from Arab Lands, which organized the meeting, told JTA.

Urman said representatives from Jews of Arab origin now living in nine countries – Belgium, Canada, France, Germany, Israel, Italy, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States – were scheduled to attend the meeting this week. Among other things on the agenda, he said, is drawing up a joint response to Libyan leader Muammar Gadhafi's visit to Rome last week. Jewish leaders in Rome boycotted a meeting over the weekend between Gadhafi and Italians expelled from Libya as the meeting was held on Shabbat. Gadhafi "missed an opportunity to set a standard in the Arab world to address the issue in an open and courageous manner," Urman said.

The 6,000 Jews forced out of Libya were among as many as 850,000 Jews from 10 Arab countries forced to flee their homelands since 1947.

EU postpones upgrading ties with Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM—European Union foreign ministers on Monday welcomed Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's conditional endorsement of a future Palestinian state, but they said it wasn't enough to raise EU-Israel ties to a higher level.

The ministers, who were due to meet Israel's foreign minister on Monday, questioned conditions cited by Netanyahu for backing a Palestinian state and also his defence of Jewish settlements on occupied land.

Netanyahu has refused to back a state for Palestinians since taking office in March, but he said on Sunday he would endorse it if Israel received guarantees it would have no army and if the Palestinians recognize Israel as a Jewish state.

"That's good, but it's only a first step," Swedish Foreign Minister Carl Bildt, whose country takes over the EU presidency next month, said before the talks in Luxembourg.

French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner said it was "not sufficient."

"Nothing was said on the settlements… but this stopping of the settlements is essential," said Kouchner, who in an earlier statement rejected any pre-conditions to peace negotiations.

The EU and Israel have agreed in principle to upgrade an "association agreement" defining their ties, a move that would bring trade benefits for both sides.

But the 27-nation bloc has postponed the upgrade and says it wants a firm commitment from Israel to seek a two-state peace accord with the Palestinians.

"We must say quite clearly today there can only be talk of an upgrade when the peace process is on its way, and for that we need a few steps more," said Luxembourg Foreign Minister Jean Asselborn.

Asked if Netanyahu's move was sufficient for the EU to upgrade ties with Israel, Finnish Foreign Minister Alexander Stubb said: "No."

The EU ministers were due to meet Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman for talks in Luxembourg on Monday evening.

Search for cash in mattress

An Israeli woman mistakenly threw out a mattress with $J million stuffed inside, setting off a frantic search through tons of garbage at a number of landfill sites. The woman told Army Radio that she bought her elderly mother a new mattress as a surprise and threw out the old one, only to discover her mother had hidden her life savings inside. The dump manager said his staff was helping the woman, but that the mattress was hard to find among the 2,500 tons of garbage arriving at the site every day.

IAEA reports on Iran

Iran has stepped up its production of nuclear fuel, according to a report by the United Nations nuclear watchdog. The Islamic Republic now has 7,200 installed centrifuges, which reportedly could fuel two nuclear weapons a year, at its underground bunker in Natanz, the International Atomic Energy Agency reported last week. But the IAEA found no evidence that the fuel has reached the stage where it is pure enough to make a bomb. That could take several months. For more than a year, IAEA inspectors have been blocked from visiting an Iranian nuclear reactor, which could be modified to produce weapons-grade plutonium, according to the report. The UN Security Council has ordered Iran to stop enriching uranium. Iran also has flouted three Security Council resolutions requiring it to answer questions about reports that its scientists have researched nuclear warhead design.

Hirchson found guilty

Former finance minister Abraham Hirchson was convicted of fraud and theft. He was found guilty of stealing $625,000 from the National Workers Organization while he worked as its chairman. Hirchson has denied any wrongdoing. Five accomplices already pleaded guilty to stealing similar sums between 1998 and 2005. Hirchson is awaiting sentencing.

Israel says it will retaliate

The security-diplomatic cabinet agreed that the Israel Defence Forces will respond to all attacks from Gaza. The cabinet met last week to discuss the situation in Gaza, including the issue of kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit, the Prime Minister's Office said. "Israel views Hamas as responsible for all aggressive actions against Israel from the Gaza Strip," the cabinet agreed, and instructed the IDF to respond to all attacks emanating from Gaza. The cabinet also discussed ways to ease restrictions on the day-to-day life of Palestinians in Gaza while maintaining Israel's security.

Family allegedly kills son

A 15-year-old Palestinian boy allegedly was killed by his family after being accused of collaborating with Israel. The victim was tortured before being hanged, according to the Jerusalem Post and other reports. Palestinian Authority police arrested several members of the teen's family in connection with the murder, including his father, uncle and a cousin. The suspects reportedly confessed to killing the teen for being a collaborator.

Most back settlement work

Nearly six of every 10 Israelis think Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu should resist U.S. demands to completely freeze construction in Jewish West Bank settlements, according to a new poll released June 12. The poll by the Maagar Mohot Polling Institute was made public ahead of Netanyahu's major policy speech on Sunday.

Carter carries letter to Hamas

Noam Schalit, father of abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit, passed a letter addressed to his son to former United States president Jimmy Carter during their meeting last Friday. Schalit met Carter, who arrived in the region for a series of talks, in Jerusalem and asked him to do what he could in order to make sure his son will receive the letter. After the meeting Schalit said the former president was one of a few Americans with links to Hamas and was hopeful that those connections could be used to secure the release of his son. Schalit also said the meeting went well and that Carter committed himself to helping Gilad's cause.

Shooter's notes show obsession with Jews

By ERIC FINGERHUT
JTA

WASHINGTON — A note was discovered in the car of the alleged Holocaust museum shooter declaring that President Barack Obama was "created" by Jews and does what his "Jew owners tell him to do."

According to court papers released last Thursday, the note was discovered in the car of James von Brunn, the 88-year-old white supremacist who has been charged with murder in the death of a security guard last Wednesday at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum. The car was parked outside the museum.

Inside a notebook, the handwritten note said, "You want my weapons – this is how you'll get them. The Holocaust is a lie. Obama was created by Jews. Obama does what Jew owners tell him to do. Jews captured America's money. Jews control the mass media. The First Amendment is abrogated – henceforth…"

Von Brunn could face the death penalty if convicted in the murder of 39-year-old Stephen T. Johns, according to media reports. He also faces a charge of killing while in possession of a firearm in a federal facility. He remains hospitalized after being shot in the face multiple times by other security guards after he opened fire on Johns.

Meanwhile, 200 people joined religious leaders last Thursday afternoon for an interfaith gathering at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum to mourn the death of museum security guard Stephen Johns.

Organized by the InterFaith Conference of Metropolitan Washington and the Jewish Community Relations Council of Greater Washington, the event included speeches and prayers by clergy from Protestant, Catholic, Muslim, Hindu and Baha'i traditions, as well as representatives of the German and Israeli embassies.

Clark Lobenstine, executive director of the InterFaith Conference, told the crowd, some of whom held candles, that the vigil was designed to show that "hate has no place in any of our community's religious traditions."

"Let's not let this terrorist divide us and prevent us from coming back here," he said.

Martin Peled-Flax, the Israeli Embassy's minister-counsellor for domestic political affairs, said Wednesday's attack showed that Holocaust denial is a "pernicious ideology that ultimately leads to insane violence," whether it comes from a "racist and anti-Semite" in Washington or at the highest levels of "leadership of the world stage," an apparent reference to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Museum chief of staff Bill Parson thanked the crowd, saying the "tremendous outpouring" since the attack "has meant a lot to us."

Both the U.S. House of Representatives and the Senate unanimously passed resolutions last Thursday condemning the shooting attack at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum and offering condolences to the family of slain security officer Stephen Johns.

Canadian artist brings Yiddish hip hop to China

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

Six thousand cheering Chinese music fans were probably hoping for something a little bit out of the ordinary when a Canadian artist named SoCalled took the main stage at the Midi Music Festival in Zhenjiang, Jiangsu province. But whatever they were expecting, Yiddish hip hop definitely wasn't it.

Nevertheless, Yiddish hip hop is what they got, or at least a rough approximation thereof. Of course, no single label really does justice to the music of Montreal's SoCalled, a.k.a. Josh Dolgin.

A mix of hip-hop beats, rap lyrics, klezmer and Yiddish samples, stick-in-your-head melodies and the unique contributions of a bunch of guest performers, SoCalled's creations are a category unto themselves. Though Dolgin has made a name for himself in both Jewish and indie music circles for the energy and originality of his music, this was the first time he had gone as far as China to play.

"It was crazy. It was fun. It was amazing," said Dolgin of the whirlwind eight-day tour.

Dolgin and his band were part of a group of Canadian musicians that made the trip, including fellow Montrealers Final Flash, Hollerado, and Creature, as well as Victoria, B.C.'s Jets Overhead. Katie Moore, a Montreal singer and long-time SoCalled collaborator, accompanied him on the tour, as did guitarist Lubo Alexandrov, violinist Alex Chow and bassist Michael Felber.

After landing in Beijing in late April, Dolgin and his crew took to the road, playing in Shanghai, Zhenjiang and Shenzhen, before heading back to Canada. Though the schedule was hectic, the band had a few opportunities to head out, see the sights, and sample the local cuisine.

"We had a day off on May Day, so we walked around checked things out. The violinist in the band ate some scorpions," Dolgin recalled.

Audiences got to experience another kind of culture shock, however, once SoCalled started to play. According to one local music critic, the set in Zhenjiang left "everyone who saw it utterly bewildered."

SoCalled on stage at a Chinese club performing his mix of hip-hop beats, rap lyrics, klezmer and Yiddish samples.

Whether this harsh assessment is a reflection of the music or the audience is open to question, but from the perspective of Dolgin and his manager, Dan Seligman, audiences were enthusiastic about the unfamiliar tunes.

"My music is kind of different anyway, so I guess people could be bewildered by the music everywhere, because it's not really normal music. But it was a totally rocking show," Dolgin said.

"It's definitely pretty unique. For one, it was totally out of cultural context. I imagine 95 per cent of the people have never heard Jewish music or heard of Jewish culture, so it was refreshing to see the music just taken for what it is as an art form, and people got into it," added Seligman, who first met Dolgin in a McGill University Yiddish literature class.

"Obviously, a lot of the references are lost. But the excitement of the people was amazing. It was like rock 'n' roll at the end of the '50s and early '60s, this unbridled enthusiasm that you don't see very often in North America," he said.

Though the tour was a success, getting to China was a bit of a chore. Seligman got a call in March from Transmission, a British Columbia organization that sponsors music industry conferences in Canada and China, asking if he and SoCalled wanted to participate.

Though the answer was yes, getting visas on time was dicey. In addition to the normal paperwork, Seligman also had to submit the lyrics to SoCalled songs, a video, and information on all of the band members.

"We just kind rolled with the punches," he said.

Though the visa application process was strenuous, once in China there was little government interference.

"I didn't feel watched or anything. There were tons of cops everywhere and army people, but I never felt under the thumb of some regime. I felt really safe. And welcome," Dolgin said.

"I mean you do notice a bit of a looming presence, and you don't necessary feel like you're walking down the streets of New York or Toronto, but we never felt like there was someone watching," Seligman said.

Montreal's Josh Dolgin, a.k.a. SoCalled, was happy to bring his music to an audience that had never heard of Jewish music or been exposed to Jewish culture.

"I think once we got the rubber stamp, it was kind of open game, but getting in, you notice the whole mechanism of control. Two of the shows we played weren't officially sanctioned shows, so I guess they weren't supposed to happen, but there's so much stuff that happens in the underground that no one would notice," he added.

For Seligman, going to China was also an opportunity to connect with Chinese artists and music industry professionals. In addition to managing SoCalled, he is also the artistic director of Pop Montreal, a major annual music festival. Though he has no immediate plans to bring over any Chinese acts, he said that he's interested in furthering connections with Chinese musicians and exploring the Chinese market for Canadian bands.

"It's still at a pretty nascent stage at the moment, but there's definitely a lot of interest beginning to develop. It definitely needs investment and cultivation and I think, beyond the mere economics of it, there are cultural, social and political issues that arise. But there definitely is potential," Seligman said.

For his part, Dolgin would like to go back, though he doesn't know when he might do so. In the meantime, he's playing more Canadian shows and working on a new album. Until his next visit, the Chinese market will have to come to him.

JAFFA ROAD

Toronto band Jaffa Road will perform at Harbourfront Centre on June 21, the final day of the Franco-Fete weekend. Led by vocalist Aviva Chernick and composer-musician Aaron Lightstone, the group is known for blending Afro-Caribbean jazz, ancient Ladino songs, reggae and Arabian grooves, but singing mostly in Hebrew. "What we are doing is part of a renaissance of Jewish and Hebrew culture," Lightstone told The CJN. The band released its debut album, Sun Place, in March. ANNE FRANK REMEMBERED ON WHAT WOULD HAVE BEEN HER 80th BIRTHDAY

Anne Frank was a teenage girl in hiding with her family from the Nazis in Holland when she began the diary that would make her, posthumously, one of the world's most widely read authors. Her diary was published seven years after her death in Bergen-Belsen in 1945. It has since been translated into 67 languages and has sold more than 25 million copies. Literary critic Ruth Wisse has noted that it is the second-most popular book, after the Bible, to emerge from the Jewish world.

Numerous events were planned to coincide with what would have been Anne's 80th birthday last week; she was born on June 12, 1929. Gala screenings of George Stevens' 1959 film, The Diary of Anne Frank, were scheduled for Los Angeles and New York, where surviving stars of the film were to be in attendance at the Pierre Hotel.

Based largely on the Broadway play by Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett, the film won three 1959 Oscars and five additional nominations. Millie Perkins, then an unknown fashion model, was plucked from among 10,000 hopefuls for the title role; Diane Baker played Anne's sister, Margot. Both actresses were to discuss their experiences at the New York screenings, along with George Stevens Jr., son of director George Stevens.

A new DVD and Blu-ray version of the film is set for release this week by 20th Century Fox. Perkins plans to present her original movie script to the Jerusalem-based Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial Museum in October.

Felsen Discusses Lithuanian Partisans: More than 60 years after the end of World War II, three elderly Lithuanian Jews who once fought as partisans against the Nazis came under investigation for alleged war crimes. In 1998, Toronto historian, Yiddishist and artist Vivian Felsen met one of the accused, Fanya Brantsovskaya, whom she visited again in Vilnius in 2006. Using substantial research, Felsen has constructed an illustrated lecture, The Case of the Jewish War Criminals. Jointly sponsored by Friends of Yiddish and the Toronto Workmen's Circle, her lecture takes place at the Workmen's Circle, 471 Lawrence Ave. W. Thursday, June 18, 7:30 p.m. Members free, non-members $8.

Play Reading at Earl Bales: Medina Theatre Ensemble presents a staged reading of Over the River and Through the Woods, Joe DiPietro's winning theatrical comedy about an Italian man whose grandparents scheme to keep him in New Jersey after he accepts a promotion in Seattle. The play features the three 'L's – love, laughter and lasagna. The reading, directed by Mario D'Alimonte, is at the Earl Bales Community Centre, Sunday, June 28, 2 p.m. Admission $5.

Names in the News: Recipients of this year's George Luscombe Award for mentorship in theatre are Leah Cherniak and Martha Ross, co-artistic directors of Theatre Columbus. Since its inception in 1983, the Toronto-based company has added 29 original comedies to the Canadian artistic landscape.

Bezmozgis makes his debut as a film director

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Having made his mark as a writer with the acclaimed Natasha and Other Stories, David Bezmozgis has reinvented himself as a screenwriter and movie director.

His debut feature film, Victoria Day, which opens in Toronto and Montreal on June 19, is a coming-of-age story based on his experiences as the son of Russian Jewish immigrants in Canada.

Set in Toronto in 1988 during the Victoria Day holiday and the launch of the Stanley Cup playoffs, Victoria Day grapples with such universal themes as adolescence and sexual awakening.

The central character, Ben Spektor (Mark Rendall), 16, is an intelligent, well-rounded, level-headed fellow. He's also unusually sensitive.

Still, boys will be boys. Ben and his wacky friends (John Mavro and Scott Beaudin), all of whom play for the high school hockey team, have begun to explore their curiosity in the opposite sex.

The object of Ben's desire is Cayla (Holly Deveaux), a remote beauty whose brother, Jordan, a bully and Ben's nemesis, suddenly goes missing.

The police get involved in Jordan's disappearance, and not surprisingly, Ben feels a little conflicted about his romantic interest in Cayla. As well, he is torn by guilt, since he grudgingly lent Jordan $5 to buy drugs.

As Bezmozgis fleshes out this theme, he focuses on Ben's changing relationship with his parents, Yuri and Milla (Sergiy Kotelents and Nataliya Alyexeyenko), who always speak to him in Russian.

Ben is an obedient and respectful son, but as his carnal desires bloom, he spends less and less time at home, much to their disappointment and concern.

Yuri is disappointed that Ben no longer wants to watch professional hockey games on television with him, while Milla is worried that he is going astray.

Yet Ben remains grounded and responsible. When Cayla, unexpectedly, comes on to him one night, he says, "Maybe we shouldn't be doing this."

To a certain degree, Victoria Day is adept in portraying Ben's disorientation as he attempts to chart a path from adolescence to adulthood.

The film, however, is somewhat less than compelling, as it generally fails to connect with the audience on a deeper emotional level.

Still, Bezmozgis' young, unknown cast tries to please and is quite appealing. Rendall conveys Ben's sensitivity and vulnerabilities, Mavro keeps jumping out of his skin, and Deveaux is sweetly demure.

Zisele's explores mother-daughter relations with laughs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Zisele, the Israeli production from Tel Aviv's Beit Lessin Theatre, had its North American premiere at Luminato, the Toronto arts festival, earlier this month.

Moria Zrachia's humorous, high-spirited and edgy celebration of mother- daughter relationships was produced in association with the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company of Toronto.

Through dance, mime and the music of Chava Alberstein and the Barry Sisters, audiences were treated to an enjoyable evening.

It was well worth the trek down to the Jane Mallett Theatre at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts.

Performing to the rhythm of a sentimental Yiddish musical score, nine performers, all but one of whom were women, struck up expressive poses for more than an hour of fun.

The principals were four dowdy Jewish mothers in flowing dresses and black shoes carrying trademark black vinyl purses.

They were by turns loving, affectionate, controlling, overbearing, sly and manipulative, practising oneupmanship in pursuit of their daughter's interests

The girls, wearing short brown skirts and beige blouses, were winsome, sexy, obstreperous and mischievous.

Not unexpectedly, the lone "boy," clad in shorts and bespectacled, looked a little bewildered, like a child who has lost his way.

As they pranced and danced on the bare stage, to the accompaniment of traditional Yiddish songs that reflected such themes as family, love, joy and sorrow, the performers exuded an infectious joie de vivre.

Zisele explored the complexity of mother-daughter relationships with energy, mirth and panache.

Reviewer to 'perform' Man Booker-nominated book

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Robert Adams has a great gig. The 72-year-old Montreal resident has spent the last 25 years getting paid to talk about his favourite books, and just recently returned from a 3-1/2-month world cruise doing just that.

"Yeah, it's not bad," the former English teacher admits.

Adams returns to Hart House at the University of Toronto on June 22 and 23, where he will review Mr. Pip, by Lloyd Jones, a 2007 Man Booker-nominated book.

"It's 90 minutes long," Adams says of what can best be described as a performance. "I do a short précis of the book, act out bits of it, talk about its history and geography and talk about what the author is trying to do." People have described him coming off stage with his shirt drenched in sweat from the effort he puts in.

Robert Adams

It all began about 25 years ago when he was approached by a friend to speak at an ORT fundraiser. At first, he wasn't sure what he would talk about but finally decided to review a book he had just finished reading, Bernard Malamud's The Assistant.

The reading was a success and he was asked to do more. "Soon I was doing 40 to 50 reviews a year."

Adams lectured to sold-out audiences for 11 years, both in Montreal and Toronto. His lectures were broadcast on TV Ontario and still air on Book TV. He has published two compilations of his lectures, one of which, A Love of Reading, was a bestseller. He decided to retire from this about four years ago because he was exhausted.

"But my wife [Pearl, who also acts as his manager and publicist] doesn't like to see me idle, and she thought, 'What about if we did a cruise?'"

They hooked up with Crystal Cruise Line, and he now lectures around the world several times a year aboard the ship. Recently, he has decided to return to the lectern doing what he loves, just a few times a year.

Obviously, Adams loves books, and estimates he has 20,000 in his house. "I used to read a book a day, but now I read four or five a week. I can think of no book that I haven't finished reading. Even if it's a bad book, like Dan Brown's The Da Vinci Code, I will keep reading hoping the good part is at the end."

Though he is no Oprah, he's been known to add at least 3,000 copies to the sale of any book he talks about.

Adams was born in Wales. He converted to Judaism while on a trip to Israel to mark Pearl's (who is Jewish) 50th birthday.

Mr. Pip is set during the Bougainville rebellion in Papua, New Guinea, in the 1990s. The rebellion began as a dispute over land and alleged environmental damage between islanders and multinational copper-mining companies and became a brutal war of independence involving government forces, well-armed militias and foreign mercenaries.

Mr. Pip tells the story of a man who during this time chose to teach the island's children from the only book available to him, Charles Dickens' Great Expectations.

"I chose it because it's an extremely well-written coming-of-age novel about a little girl. It's a marvellous story set during a little-known event."

While on the world cruise, Adams got a chance to meet the New Zealand author of the book and discuss its finer points. "That's the sort of thing I like to pass on to my audience," he says.

Adams reviews Mr. Pip on June 22 and 23 at 8 p.m and 2 p.m. respectively. Tickets are $35 and available at 416-978-8849 or uoftix.ca.

Award-winning author bears an affinity to Laurence

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The White Space Between, the novel by Montrealer Ami Sands Brodoff that won the 2009 Canadian Jewish Book Award for fiction, focuses on Willow Ives and her mother, Jane Ives, a Czech-born Holocaust survivor formerly known as Jana Ivanova, and Willow's need to understand the persistent gaps in her mother's past.

Much of the story unfolds in Montreal, where Willow, following in her late grandfather's footsteps, becomes a talented professional puppeteer; she creates a diverse family of marionettes that she gives life and voice to, seeming to need this imaginary world as a child needs dolls. Because her mother has kept much of her wartime experiences a blank, Willow knows hardly anything about her father, who becomes a mythic figure in her imagination.

When her mother (who had been living in New Jersey) decides to return to Montreal to testify for the Witness Foundation, Willow feels mixed emotions. "She is unnerved that her mother would now decide to tell her story to strangers, a story Willow has been told only in bits and pieces, fragments that don't quite fit into a whole. And yet in truth, she has been afraid to hear this story, as much as she longs and needs to, settling up here in Montreal to sleuth it out on her own."

Willow's quest takes her to the top of Montreal's mountain and also to Prague; she eventually solves the riddle of her paternity and fills in many of the white spaces in her psychic identity card. The book offers a good example of what Toronto poet-essayist Kenneth Sherman meant when he described the two opposing impulses of Holocaust literature, the simultaneous imperatives to hide and yet to tell, as "void and voice."

For the first three decades or so after the Holocaust, relatively few writers seemed willing to venture into that dark and largely uncharted literary terrain. Then, shortly after the groundbreaking TV series, Holocaust, in the mid-1970s, Elie Wiesel commented that once no one wanted to talk about the Holocaust and suddenly everyone seemed eager to do so..

That eagerness continues: today Holocaust lit still dominates Jewish letters. A century from now, how many of these books will be read? We like to believe that the best – by authors such as Wiesel, Anne Frank, Primo Levi and Aharon Appelfeld – will survive, while less notable works will submerge into literature's invisible bedrock.

In my reading of The White Space Between, the book seemed to start slowly, but the characters became more sympathetic and intriguing with each turning page. Brodoff's prose bears an affinity to the work of Margaret Laurence in her exploration of the mother-daughter relationship, her periodic insertion of old photos and memory capsules into the narrative, and her search for the basic humanity in people. Brodoff, who has published a previous novel and collection of short stories, is a writer worth watching.

The Diary of Laura's Twin, by Kathy Kacer, took the youth literature prize at the 2009 Canadian Jewish Book Awards. Like The White Space Between, it is published by the remarkable Second Story Press of Toronto.

Part of that publishing house's successful series of Holocaust Remembrance Books for Young Readers, The Diary of Laura's Twin tells the story of a modern-day Jewish girl who is "twinned" with Sara Gittler, a child from the Warsaw Ghetto. The narrative alternates between Laura's and Sara's diametrically different worlds, which are at least 60 years apart, and is illustrated by many photographs of the latter.

Again we see the familiar pattern of a young protagonist, Laura, who fills in the void of her unknowing by reading Sara's Holocaust diary, then speaks about her "twin" at her bat mitzvah ceremony. Inspired by Sara's bravery, Laura finds the courage to act after learning of a friend's silence after possibly witnessing the desecration of a Jewish cemetery.

Holocaust remembrance that sparks social justice: a winning formula for mass-market juvenile fiction. No doubt the book will be popular with young Jewish and gentile readers alike.

Kacer also just won the prestigious 2009 Yad Vashem Prize for Children's Holocaust Literature for her book Hiding Edith.

Isa Milman's Prairie Kaddish, winner of the 2009 Canadian Jewish Book Award for poetry, seems to redefine the meaning of poetry. Here we have a book of remembrance, a sort of historic scrapbook about the former Jewish agricultural settlement of Lipton, Sask., and the picturesque graveyard that remains.

Milman includes maps, photographs, letters, lists of names and Yiddish subtitles between her free-form poetic creations. In poems such as Immigrant Song, she documents her discovery of Lipton's Jewish past, right from the moment of her first visit to the cemetery.

As if I heard a drum struck by an invisible hand, as if after 30 years in Canada
the grass sang me a welcome song.
As if those Jewish bones called me meydele, said they'd waited for me so long, as if they laid their hands on my eyes to unblind me, and pulled me close to listen as they whispered fragments of their stories, slices of their dreams…

The poetry is vibrant and accessible, and has caught on like a prairie wildfire after a recent review in Forward. A rarity for a book of poetry, Prairie Kaddish has already gone into a second printing. The publisher is Coteau Books of Regina (www. coteaubooks.com).

Soccer team preparing for Maccabiah by getting hot

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Maccabiah Games kick off on July 12 and one thing athletes competing in Israel can count on is that it will be hot. As in, relentless, sun-drenched 30 degree hot.

With that in mind, the coach of the Canadian women's soccer team, has instructed all 16 players to prepare for the games by practicing hot yoga. That's the exercise discipline where participants go through a series of postures and stretches in a studio heated to 40 degrees celsius. It's designed to limber up the body while expelling nasty toxins through sweat.

The hot yoga experience is part of a preparatory regimen designed by coach Chris Lewis that includes gym workouts and reminders to stay hydrated. That preparation will hopefully give the women's team a leg up when they compete in Israel.

Maccabi Canada has never sent an open (adult) women's team to the games before though four years ago a junior girls team won the bronze medal in a three-country competition.

This year the Canadians will face contingents from Britain, the United States, Australia and Israel, said Jacqui Markowitz, manager of the women's team.

"I don't know the competition but I expect it to be stiff," she said. "But we have some very good players on the team and we have so much heart. The team has this wonderful spirit about it and that can take you far."

The team will rely on a handful of college varsity-level talent, including Markowitz's daughter, Nicole, who plays for York University, Anne Friedland, who earned a soccer scholarship at Brown University in the NCAA, and Leah Peric, goalkeeper for the University of British Columbia.

The others are good players recruited across the country with a variety of soccer backgrounds, including Nicole's sister Jesse, who played on the junior team four years ago. Lewis, their Winnipeg-based coach, has led three women's teams to Provincial Cup championships and has twice coached women's teams at the Canada Games, Markowitz stated.

Goalkeeper Leah Peric, above, and Sari Mogul, going down to her knee on right, are key members of the women's team.

Rachel Lowenstein, 20, is a midfielder from Vancouver who has been playing soccer since she was a kid. Twice a provincial high school champion with Point Grey Secondary School, she also was on the Vancouver team that competed at the JCC Maccabi (youth) Games in New Jersey six years ago.

That team "did not do that well," she recalled.

Four years ago she made the cut for the junior team that went to the Maccabiah, but other commitments did not permit her to go.

This time she's one of four British Columbia players to make the team.

"I think it's an amazing opportunity to come together with other Jewish athletes from around the world," she said. "It's great that this is the first time there's a Canadian women's team."

Lowenstein has visited Israel before as part of a Biluim youth trip. Formerly of Toronto, she attended United Synagogue Day School before her family moved to British Columbia seven years ago.

Her teammate, Nicole Markowitz, is a veteran of the Maccabiah sports experience. A member of the junior team four years ago, she recalled the games as "an amazing experience. It was my first time going.

"The opening ceremonies were amazing. It was like nothing I was expecting. They went all out, the performance, tons of people watching. It was a really good surprise."

As part of the Maccabiah experience, the team was taken on tours of Jerusalem and the Dead Sea.

They also mingled with athletes from around the world: "It was cool meeting people from all different countries" and making long-term friends with other girls on the Canadian team, Markowitz, 20, said.

She's been training four days a week in preparation for the games, working out with the team she played for last year as a midfielder/striker, the Lady Lynx, as well as York U.

On July 5, Maccabi Canada's five soccer teams – open men and women, junior boys and girls and Masters (35+) – will gather for a four-day training camp at various fields in G. Ross Lord Park.

The women's team was selected from more than 40 women who tried out last summer, Jacqui Markowitz said. To commit to the games speaks to their "joy for Israel and their Jewish identity. To my mind, these are our future leaders."

Our first dinner party

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

We lay in bed, silently tense. "So, when will you be up to it?" Meir asked, finally. "It's been a long while, now," he added.

"Oh, all right already," I responded sharply. "But only two couples!"

You see, it's been a while since we've hosted friends at home. It's not that I don't like hosting, it's that I hate it.

But during the many months we've been here, we've been entertained quite generously. So be it.

Meir is giddy. If it were up to him, coming home every night from work and finding 50 people holding cocktail glasses in his house would mean living his dream.

We start to make a list. I hate everybody. I mean, I'll fall in love with you when we're at a restaurant, or at a show, but you're forever my rival once I have to ask: "Carol, would you like decaf or regular?"

When (after a bloodied battle) the list is done, Meir, in a dreamy voice, starts talking about the menu: "I feel like trying my rich beef stew with fried onion, rosemary, mushrooms and honey sauce."

"I'm so out of here," I think to myself.

To elevate my crabby mood, I take the kids to the Promenade Mall (plus, I can't stand watching Meir cleaning, with his bad back and all). I meet Shira, an acquaintance, in the food court. I take my trays and my kids, and I sit next to her.

I notice she's very quiet.

Finally, she says: "My husband told me he had heard Meir talking about some party at your place. Thanks a lot for not inviting us. And after you've eaten three meals at our home. I mean, after all... never mind."

I reply instantly: "Silly you! Of course you're invited! What were you thinking?"

Shira is all smiles. "Great. My kids really miss yours."

Kids?

"Who needs kids?!" I shout at my husband when I get home.

After he calms down, he explains: "We've always been invited as a family."

During the next week, Meir tries not to make direct eye contact with me, as the list grows and grows. It's not that we know so many people, but rumours circulate quickly among lonely Israeli-Canadians.

Later in the week, we stroll around the posh supermarket, filling our cart – here another smoked salmon, there another steak, and everywhere words like, "Don't be cheap, Nina."

It's not that, I swear! It's the hosting thing!

We also pay a visit to the wine store.

At home, my job is to e-mail everybody with party details. Meir only needs to cook and to clean.

After I send the e-mails – to 43 people, minus their kids – I feel relaxed. Content, even. Meir is happy with my new state of mind.

Meanwhile, I'm stealing Belgian bonbons from the kitchen and taking a mental break. You see, I wrote the wrong date in the invitations. I've invited everyone to our house on the day before the occasion, the same day that Meir was planning to take us to the movies in order to relax my nerves before the dinner party.

So, if you came last Tuesday and no one was home, please understand. I simply couldn't.

I promise I'll invite you when I'm ready. So don't hate me. God knows Meir does.

Balance and core strength

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Recently, I attended a conference called Ageless Motion, where I spent two days learning about the relationship between core strength, balance, stability, speed of movement and quality of life.

You need core strength simply to cross the street before the light turns green without losing your balance or falling. You would never expect that the ability to contract your core muscles and take a step at the same time would be the determining factor in balancing, but it is.

The conference was incredibly exciting for me because of my personal experience – I've had two back surgeries. I have been training through my core for more than eight years, so that I can remain pain free, maintain mobility and prevent further injury.

Now the newest research tells us that as we age it is not only essential to strengthen the core muscles to reduce chronic back pain and improve posture but also, more importantly, to maintain a high quality of life, which includes independent living.

The core consists of 30 muscles, both large and small, that stabilize the torso from shoulders to pelvis. These muscles, working together, allow fluid movement of our limbs. The core controls the transfer of energy and the shift in body weight of every movement.

A strong core means your body can effectively distribute the weight-bearing stresses of everyday living, from reaching for a glass in the cupboard and walking upstairs to getting out of a chair. All movements, from the simple to the most complex, originate from the core – without it we are powerless.

Who would have thought that performing regular body-weight squats would affect your ability to climb a flight of stairs 10 years from now, but it does and how!

A weak or an unbalanced core is linked to chronic hip and back pain that can lead to immobility, which in turn leads to a lower quality of life.

The most important piece of information I walked away with from this year's conference is that no matter what your age, fitness level or limitations, move, and if you don't know how, hire an expert to teach you.

Honour thy father and mother

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The Ten Commandments state, "Thou shall not kill." That makes sense as killing undermines, more than any other action, one's relationship with God and the community.

God constructs a body and infuses it with a soul. It would seem therefore it is up to God to "taketh," not personkind. If murdering was sanctioned, respect for the ethereal and the here-and-now would dissipate and havoc would envelop the world.

Within that same set of laws exists the commandment, "Honour thy father and mother." Perhaps, this obligation stems from the same reasoning as "thou shall not murder" – that if we were to disrespect our parents, those who made us with God, we would be belittling the Creator, and creation itself. This would lead to disunity with our neighbours, community and humankind.

I recently received a note from a friend, in which she talked about her love and kavod (respect) for her parents. Her word reflects the importance and beauty of respecting your mother and father, and clarifies the necessity of honouring "thy father and mother."

My friend wrote that her mother is 81 years old and her father, 82. Her dad suffers from dementia, and her mom is tired and having a hard time coping with the day-to-day challenges of taking care of her spouse.

The saving grace, however, is that my friend and her children live with her parents, which makes it "easier for me to tend to what they need and to ensure someone is always in the house."

She writes that this setup, one which used to be the norm in most cultures, is hard on her children. Her 22-year-old takes her grandparents to appointments when her university schedule is clear. That can be tough.

"It is hard emotionally, but I wouldn't have it any other way," my friend adds. This is respect.

She says that the only thing her parents ever asked of her was to be happy – "because when one is happy, everything else falls into place." She says they were always there for her; the door was forever open with no questions asked. Essentially, they created an environment where respect and love thrived.

She tells me that her father is a Holocaust survivor and lost his entire family when he was only 13 years old. Now he is suffering from dementia, and he is forgetting his second family and wonders "how HaShem could take another family away from him." How deeply sad. My friend has a hard time coping with this and says it weighs heavily on her.

My friend has a beautiful spirit, a child-like one, which is reflected in this statement: "When I am sick with a migraine or have a bad day, I go straight into my mom's room and lay down on her bed.

"When my sister says, 'I am coming to your house Friday,' I always say, 'You mean, mom and dad's.'"

She adds that often she watches TV with her father, just to be with him. "They are my world," she says.

"My father showed me his tallit, I cried. My mother talks about Baycrest for my dad, I cried." She is the "sensitive" child and therefore could not attend the meetings dealing with moving her dad into Baycrest. "It is painful," she writes.

My friend told me that the thought of her parents leaving her forever is too much to bear and "life is the best when they are around. My parents are gifts from God, and I treat them as such." This is respect.

Honour thy father and mother.

"We won't abandon Jews"

Solomon's heirs airlifted home

JERUSALEM (JPFS) —

Israel made history last Saturday, completing a massive, dramatic airlift that rescued virtually the beleaguered Ethiopian Jews from Addis Ababa to their ancestral homeland in a mere matter of hours.

Operation Solomon, conducted by the Israel Army and Air Force under the direction of Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, with the full cooperation of the American government, brought [illegible] Ethiopian Jews in [illegible] flights.

[illegible] said one El Al ground-crew worker as he helped an infeebled old woman onto one of the hundreds of buses that transported new arrivals to absorption centres and hotels around the country.

"We dreamed, we fought, we waited for this day to arrive," said Rahamim Elazar, a longtime community activist. "I always believed Israel would save them and it did. We applaud this country for its great heart."

go flight — and at least one flight by Ethiopian Airlines.

There were no seats in the jumbos, and the new immigrants sat packed together in what seemed like a human carpet. One army bus driver commenting on the new world record, said: "You could never dent with pedigo Russians and Israelis with five suitcases in each hand."

They are then these Ethiopians [illegible] powerful, bring anything more than a small bag of belongings, in order to maximize space and passenger comfort.

"We dreamed, we fought, we waited for this day to arrive," said Rahamim Elazar, a longtime community activist and director of Israel Radio's Amharic broadcasts. "I always believed Israel would save them, and it did. We applaud this country for its great heart."

Although planning for a rescue operation began over a year ago, when thousands of Ethiopian Jews from the remote north flocked to the compound of the Israeli Embassy in Addis Ababa, Prime Minister Shamir did not give the final go-ahead for the Friday-Saturday operation until the previous Tuesday, after Ethiopian dictator Mengistu Haile Mariam fled his country as rebels closed in on the capital, an informed source said.

By LEORA FRUCHT
JERUSALEM —

As dusk enveloped Jerusalem, the first busloads of Ethiopian Jews arrived in the city that had been the object of their yearnings and prayers. It was seven o'clock on Friday night, and as dark descended on the city, they stepped off the buses silently, some 800 men, women and children, most of them [illegible] in white robes, in what

For the children, too, the meaning of the plane ride and their new surroundings evaded them. An Ethiopian boy waving an Israeli flag eagerly told strangers, "I live in Addis Abada."

Anxious to show off his few words of Hebrew, he added with a proud grin "I

'We thank God for Israel'

Editorial

The "equivalent" Canadian experience today would entail bringing approximately 100,000 men, women and children, non-stop over Friday and Saturday, to the country's largest airport from a land centuries behind Canada's standard of living.

Canadians can only imagine the feeling. We have never lived through such an epochal moment. We have never received that jaw-dropping news bulletin interrupting "regular programming."

Nor have we ever been summoned by conscience or duty or heart in the manner that summoned the people of Israel on May 24 and 25, 18 years ago.

Through the methodical course of 36 heart-stopping hours, the Jewish state rescued some 14,500 Jews from their precarious homes in Ethiopia.

The following small sampling of brief excerpts from the news reports in The CJN of May 30, 1991, tries to convey how and what the tiny country felt on the day the rescue mission was announced.

* * *

"This is the reason why Israel exists," said one El Al ground-crew worker, as he helped an enfeebled old woman onto one of the hundreds of buses that transported new arrivals to 46 absorption centres and hotels around the country.

* * *

"We dreamed, we fought, we waited for this day to arrive," said Rahamim Elazar, a longtime community activist. "I always believed Israel would save them and it did. We applaud this country for its great heart."

* * *

By Saturday, the exhaustion and fatigue gave way to other emotions. As word spread about Operation Solomon, Israelis began to converge on the hotel. They brought bags bursting with clothing and shoes, having heard that the Ethiopians had arrived with only what they were wearing. They distributed toys and sweets to the children.

* * *

One seasoned reporter, who couldn't help periodically bursting out in tears, said later that he had never seen such warmth and fraternity among the hundreds of sabras involved in the operation. "The singing and clapping and pure joy was the kind of thing that makes you forget about all the trials of living in this country."

* * *

Toward the end of what turned out to be a transcendental day for thousands of Israelis and new Israelis, two veteran Ethiopian immigrants, young women who were among the hundreds of volunteers lending a hand, sat on the curb of a street a few hundred yards from the air force airfield. "Thank God," said Pennina Oshuter. "We thank God," said Desta Usef. "We thank God for Israel."

◊◊◊

This tribute supplement commemorating Israel's 61st year of independence is dedicated to the anniversary of Operation Solomon, that secret rescue mission 18 years ago. It is hard to imagine any other country on earth caring enough about a "lost" kinfolk to undertake a similar rescue.

In the words of the two young women who helped bring the Jews home, "We thank God for Israel."

— The Editor

The 40 flights of Operation Solomon

On Nov. 19, 1984, the government of Israel commenced the airlift of Jews from Ethiopia to Israel. The mission was called Operation Moses. It was kept entirely secret from the public and intended to "bring home" on eagles' wings, as it were, the entire community of some 25,000 Jews in Ethiopia to Israel.

But the operation came to an abrupt end on Jan. 5, 1985, prematurely curtailed, in part, by leaks to the media.

Once the fact and the scope of the rescue became known, Arab governments brought extreme pressure upon the Sudanese government, through whose territory the Jews journeyed, to stop facilitating the Israeli airlift.

During the six weeks of the rescue some 8,000 Jews were brought to Israel. But more than 15,000 Jews – the Beta Yisrael, as they called themselves – were left behind in Ethiopia.

Some 6-1/2 years later, on May 24, 1991, in a carefully orchestrated clandestine mission of about 40 flights – code-named Operation Solomon – that lasted less 36 hours, the remaining Beta Yisrael came home to Israel.

When the last of the 40 planes had brought its precious cargo to Israel, the president and the prime minister of the Jewish state issued the following statements.

'We witnessed the loftiest mission of Zionism'

"The remainder of Ethiopian Jewry has been brought to Israel in a complex airlift rescue campaign – carried out in the dead of the night and concluded a mere few hours ago – which will be engraved in the history of contemporary Zionism. This small community, whose years of exile are as long as the suffering of the exile of the Jewish people, has been brought to secure shores: entire villages, women, the elderly and children.

"Before our eyes, we witnessed the realization of the loftiest mission of Zionism and of the sacred goal for which the Jewish state was established.

"The finest forces were harnessed for this daring operation and, to them, I extend our praise and gratitude. To the new immigrants, we extend an adoptive hand and we welcome them. May their speedy absorption heal their suffering and bring an end to their wandering."

May 25, 1991

President Chaim Herzog

'The airlift brought about 15,000 immigrants'

"The evacuation to Israel of the remainder of Ethiopian Jewry was concluded today within the framework of Operation Solomon. With this, another glorious chapter in the history of immigration to Israel has ended.

"Since yesterday morning [Friday], an airlift from Addis Ababa to Israel was set in motion. The airlift brought about 15,000 immigrants in about 40 direct flights.

"The operation was undertaken with the approval of the Ethiopian authorities and with their active assistance. Among other things, planes belonging to the Ethiopian national airline transported some of the immigrants. The [Israel Defence Forces] was charged with co-ordinating and operating the airlift. Planes belonging to El Al were also used. Israel expresses its gratitude to the government of the United States for its assistance in Operation Solomon, and it extends special thanks to U.S. President George Bush for his assistance over the past few years in the rescue of Ethiopian Jewry.

"Government and public sectors – including the IDF, the Foreign Ministry, the Defence Ministry and the Jewish Agency – participated in Operation Solomon and contributed to its successful conclusion today at 16:30."

May 25, 1991

Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir

Canadian youth discover Israel in programs such as Birthright - Taglit that Rabbi Poupko urges must be supported.

By RABBI REUBEN J. POUPKO

Recent studies surveying the attitudes of American Jews have revealed a decline in identification with Israel among the young. The starkest contrast is between those over 65 and those under 35, with only 20 per cent of the younger group being "highly attached" to Israel, a designation the surveyors attach to more than 40 per cent of the older demographic.

The reasons for this decline are rather obvious. Attachment to Israel is invariably linked to overall Jewish identification, and when general identification decreases, there is an expected drop-off in attachment to Israel. By all criteria of measurement, many Jews in the United States are incredibly disaffected and view their ethnic identity as compelling no particular obligation of lifestyle.

Much of the community's distress over the younger generation has to do with expectations that are not always reasonable. Jews who are over 50 came of age in a time of great Israeli leaders and momentous Israeli accomplishments. Jews of that generation were inspired by Golda Meir, Moshe Dayan, Menachem Begin – larger-than-life figures who inspired honest admiration and awe. The Six Day War, the dramatic turnaround of the Yom Kippur war, the Entebbe rescue and the ingathering of Jews from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia were events that inspired pride in Israel and emboldened Jewish identification throughout the Diaspora.

Jewish students entering university today have grown up in an entirely different universe. They grew up in the aftermath of then-prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination. Their first memories of Israel are of intifadah, retreat from Lebanon and disengagement from Gaza. Every prime minister of Israel in their memory has been investigated for criminal misconduct. They have seen a president resign and a former defence minister convicted of deplorable personal behaviour. Sadly, this list of recent political scandals in Israel is far from complete.

When older Jews stop to consider what they found so inspiring about Israel, and contrast their memories and experiences with their children's and grandchildren's, they may be more forgiving of the attitudes of the younger generations.

It is perhaps useful as well to reflect on the dramatic changes in the Israeli advocacy agenda. Throughout the '70s and '80s, the agenda was simple and well-defined. The Jewish community enjoyed relative unanimity in opposing negotiations with the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) and its leader Yasser Arafat, and were unified on insisting that Jerusalem remain undivided. There was a broad consensus on the legitimacy of Zionism and pride in the story of its founding and development.

Since Oslo, however, young Jews are left with very little to fight for. The PLO and Arafat were heralded as "partners for peace," Jerusalem has been put on the negotiating table and the Palestinian narrative has been granted undue legitimacy. The campus advocacy agenda today is hardly more than being against apartheid week – cause for which one is hard-pressed to inspire passion.

The pathology that animates the attitudes of some Jews doesn't simply end with a lack of Zionist passion and conviction; sometimes it descends into something much more insidious and has deeper roots in Jewish history than one might initially imagine.

Many insightful observers of Israel and its opponents have made the persuasive case that current anti-Zionism and classical anti-Semitism have much in common. They describe how Israel has become the new "Jew." They go on to illustrate that the dynamic that plagued individual Jews and their communities in eastern and central Europe is alive and well among the virulent detractors of Israel today. The same accusations, using nearly the same vocabulary, that were levelled at the Jews in Diaspora are directed at the State of Israel. The obsessive fascination with Israel's alleged shortcomings and the bizarre alliance between the ultra-left and radical Islam defy a reasoned response. This alliance – ubiquitous in Europe and present on North American campuses – has led too many of the left to embrace causes that represent a profound betrayal of their own putative values.

The story of Israel still inspires our young

The painful reality, as well, is that these alliances are almost always fronted by Jews claiming to speak for "real" Jewish values. That these are the only times they do anything as "Jews" has escaped attention. (The Jewish critics of whom I speak of do not include those Zionists on the left who dissent from particular Israeli policies but never question Israel's basic legitimacy or call for boycotts and disinvestment.)

The argument that the classical anti-Semitism has morphed into today's anti-Zionism needs to be taken one step further. Given that today's anti-Semitism is directed at Israel, we can also draw a direct line from Jewish responses to classical anti-Semitism and the response of some to anti-Israel advocacy today.

Canadian youth in Jerusalem after arriving from Poland on the March of the Living.

In places like Germany and Hungary in the 19th century, there was a widespread movement of conversion to Christianity by Jews seeking to escape the stigma of being Jewish and the burdens of anti-Semitism. When being Jewish was primarily a religious designation, apostasy was religious in nature. Now that Jewish identity and Zionism are nearly one and the same, apostasy becomes a political act. Those Jews who lead anti-Israel campaigns in Europe and on North American campuses are the spiritual descendants of the apostates of the late 19th century.

After I spoke at a downtown Montreal pro-Israel rally during the recent Gaza offensive, a Jew in his 30s, part of a tiny anti-Israel counter-demonstration, yelled at me, saying, "Thank you for causing anti-Semitism."

There have always been Jews who believed that the surest way to to end anti-Semitism is to stop being Jewish, or in today's categories, stop being a Zionist. On that score, history speaks for itself.

All of the negative, however, is far outweighed by the positive. The State of Israel still represents the greatest story of self-liberation in history. Understood correctly, it is the story of an aboriginal people defying the normal course of history and throwing off the yoke of exile and imperialism to return home. It is a story of a small country in a hostile region defending itself against adversaries, while at the same time, maintaining a vibrant democracy, a vigorous free press, an activist supreme court and assiduous attention to human rights.

The record of Israel and the conduct of its army are morally superior to those of any other country and army in analogous circumstances. The continuing success of Israel, devoid of substantial natural resources, in high-tech and medical research defies comparison. The story of the Jewish People is the most dramatic reversal of fortune on record. This story still inspires our young six decades after Israel's founding.

What the earlier-cited studies also make clear is that travel to Israel and Zionist education have a dramatic impact on the attitudes of young Jews. When they are allowed to see Israel with their own eyes rather than having it filtered through the media, they demonstrate the same level of commitment to Zionism as previous generations.

Our young are better than previous generations in that without witnessing glorious events or heroic leaders, they are still as committed to Israel as their parents and grandparents, when they have a chance to see Israel for themselves.

Jewish communities, regardless of economic circumstances, need – for their own survival – to redouble support for Birthright, March of the Living and any and all programs that take students, young couples and future leadership to Israel. It is demonstrably possible to keep the passion for Israel alive if we permit our young people to see and breathe Jewish history in its places of origin and its natural environment.

I am a Zionist. The best thing about me is that I am a Zionist. Most Jews who are Zionists believe that too about themselves and will continue to believe it.

Is Obama betting on wrong horse in Abbas?

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

As the United States presses for progress in Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking, U.S. President Barack Obama is redoubling Washington's efforts to strengthen Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Analysis

The thinking is that with strong U.S. backing, Abbas will be able to carry the Palestinian street and deliver a workable peace deal with Israel.

But some analysts question whether Abbas has the clout to cut a deal that will be accepted by most Palestinians. They reckon Obama is betting on the wrong horse.

In his meetings last month with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Obama made one overriding demand: that Israel evacuate illegal West Bank outposts and freeze all construction in existing Jewish settlements. The move is calculated to enhance America's standing in the Arab world, bolster Abbas' flagging support on the Palestinian street and prevent the growth of what Washington considers obstacles to peace: Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

Abbas left Washington gratified and emboldened, saying he would not accept any modifications to the 2002 Arab peace initiative, which proposed trading peace for Israel's return to its pre-1967 borders and a deal on Palestinian refugees. Earlier, Abbas said he would not meet with Netanyahu until the Israeli leader accepted the two-state solution and agreed to freeze all settlement construction, per Obama's demand.

Israeli officials argue that the fate of settlements should be decided in a final peace deal and that, in the interim, normal life in those communities should be allowed to continue – including construction to accommodate natural growth.

In the Israeli view, many of the settlements will remain under Israeli control in any peace deal.

The Bush administration had supported that position. Last month in London, an Israeli delegation led by cabinet minister Dan Meridor reminded U.S. special Middle East envoy George Mitchell of the 2004 letter from President George W. Bush that promised to help Israel retain large settlement blocs.

The Israelis asked: what's the point of freezing construction in communities that by all accounts would remain on the Israeli side of any future border?

They said they were surprised to discover that the new administration apparently doesn't intend to honour the Bush commitment.

Some pundits believe Obama may be withholding that commitment as leverage to press Netanyahu into accepting the two-state model for Israeli-Palestinian peace.

Obama also hopes to encourage the Jewish state to make concessions for peace by bolstering Israel's sense of security.

For more than two years, U.S. Gen. Keith Dayton has been training Palestinian Authority forces in the West Bank to keep the peace and fight terrorism. The idea is to provide stability to the West Bank and create a situation in which Israel can feel confident about withdrawing its forces from the area.

Obama has also promised to invest $400 million in developing an improved Arrow anti-missile system and, according to Netanyahu aides, told the prime minister in May that he won't press Israel on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

They say the focus on settlements could divert attention from actual peacemaking, and as Israel and the United States tangle over bricks and mortar, the peace process will suffer. They also argue that Obama is making a huge blunder in trying to construct an ambitious new Middle Eastern peace edifice with a Palestinian partner who cannot deliver, due to Abbas' political weakness.

Part of the problem is that the Palestinians have never been as disunited as they are today.

It's not only a question of Hamas in Gaza and Fatah in the West Bank (six people were killed in a gunfight between Fatah forces and Hamas earlier this month in the West Bank city of Kalkilya). Fatah itself is deeply divided, both between veterans and the young guard, and on key issues.

For example, Abbas heads a group that advocates advancing Palestinian goals by political means only; a second group holds that there should also be non-violent civil struggle; while a third group says the possibility of resorting to armed struggle or terrorism should be held in reserve.

And whereas Abbas is for the immediate establishment of a Palestinian state, Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and a small group of leading businessmen argue that first there should be a long period of institution-building to ensure that the state isn't established on a foundation of corruption.

The upshot of all these divisions, says Menachem Klein, an expert on Palestinian affairs at Bar-Ilan University, is that Abbas and the Fayyad government have little support in Fatah or on the Palestinian street. Only a Fatah-Hamas national unity government with wide popular support can provide a Palestinian partner that can deliver, Klein says.

For the past several weeks, Fatah and Hamas have been negotiating on a national unity government in Cairo, with little success.

Egypt has said it will give the parties until July 7 to come to an agreement. If they fail, it would mean more trouble for Palestinian unity – and for hopes for progress on the Israeli-Palestinian front.

Bar-Ilan president heads new 'brain gain' effort

By RAPHAEL AHREN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RAMAT GAN — Israel should take advantage of the economic crisis and its adverse impact on universities abroad to turn the recent brain drain into a "brain gain," Bar-Ilan University President Prof. Moshe Kaveh said recently.

Now would be an opportune time for the government and the universities to expand efforts to recruit immigrant scientists and returning Israeli academics, Kaveh said.

Moshe Kaveh

"In the last seven years or so, we lost about 700 to 800 academic staff at different levels – basically an entire university," Kaveh told Ha'aretz. "The danger is, once they are abroad, they don't come back."

Each year, thousands of university-educated Israelis are lured to pursue their careers overseas by greater professional opportunities and higher salaries, especially in the United States. Bar-Ilan estimates that there are more Israeli scientists in universities abroad than in all seven Israeli universities combined.

To combat that trend, Kaveh is spearheading a nationwide effort to bring 500 researchers back to Israelis universities by 2014.

He said that since 2006, local institutions of higher learning have absorbed a few dozen academics. He believes the current crisis presents "a unique opportunity" to expand the campaign initiated by the President's Circle, comprising the heads of the seven local universities.

"After every major crisis, Israel saw a surge in researchers," the renowned physicist said. "After the Six Day War [in the late 1960s], many scientists came to Israel. The same happened after Perestroika in Russia [in the late 1980s]. Now, the financial crisis presents us with a third great opportunity. The universities outside Israel suffer and cannot absorb new researchers – especially those who came from outside the U.S., like Israelis – which makes it the perfect time for us to call them home."

Kaveh said he and the presidents of the other universities are trying to convince senior cabinet members to increase the state budget in favour of the universities. "True, the crisis has also hit Israel in some respects, but the enrichment that comes with the absorption of new researchers will yield a return of that investment five to 10 times more," Kaveh said. "If we miss this opportunity, it won't come back for a long time."

During the past three years, Kaveh said he spent a lot of time recruiting potential returnees at Ivy League schools.

"What I noticed there is that many [academics] are Zionist," he stressed. "They would like to come back, but they want to be able to do research. If we give them a chance to do that, they'd be very happy to come back."

One recruit who returned despite taking a pay cut is Sol Efroni, 38, who recently joined Bar-Ilan's Goodman Faculty of Life Sciences after having spent five years at the National Institutes of Health in Maryland.

"I want them to have the same kind of experience that I had, and I want them to be surrounded by their family," Efroni, a computational biologist, said of his three children, all of whom are U.S. citizens.

"It would have been easy to stay in the States," he said. "It's easier to find a job and the pay is much higher. But then I noticed that the kids gave up on their Hebrew – they are talking English among themselves. They were definitely out of tune with Israeli society. They were becoming Americans. That's when I decided to go back."

Orit Shefi, 40, was hired by Bar-Ilan's school of engineering after more than three years at the University of California, San Diego. She, too, is earning much less. "But I feel my roots are here," she told Ha'aretz.

"Our connections to Israel were stronger than my career ambitions. In the States, you just feel like it's the centre of the scientific world."

Yet Shefi, her husband and their three sons together decided they wanted to live in Israel. "If my salary were my main motivation in life, I wouldn't have gone into research," she said. "I decided long ago that my life wouldn't just be about making money."

Torontonian volunteers at free Jerusalem dental clinic

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Toronto dentist Arthur Dunec recently returned from Israel, where he volunteered at Dental Volunteers for Israel (DVI) for the sixth time.

"It feels great to be able to help the poor children of Jerusalem, and there are so many of them in need," Dunec said.

Holocaust survivor Trudi Birger founded DVI in 1980, when she recognized the need for dental care and dental education among disadvantaged children living in Jerusalem.

The dental clinic is open to children and teenagers aged five to 18, regardless of their race or religion.

The clinic program recently expanded and now includes six dental workstations, an X-ray unit and a preventative unit, where children receive oral hygiene education.

Dunec, who volunteered at DVI for the first time in 1990, said that the dental program operates with the support of visiting dentists from around the world who volunteer for one or more weeks. Over the past 29 years, more than 4,500 dentists have volunteered at DVI.

Dunec said that since its inception, the free clinic has treated more than 400,000 children.

"I am constantly learning new techniques from other volunteer dentists and from the clinic director," he said.

"This is appropriate, as dentists are perpetual students – always striving to learn new methods and improve."

He said that, over the years, he has seen a significant improvement in the dental health of the clinic's patients. "The free clinic's preventative programs have made a positive impact," he said.

His schedule at the clinic also allows him plenty of opportunity to sightsee and explore Jerusalem and other areas in Israel.

"As a Jew, I feel that everywhere I go in Israel, I am among family and I belong," he said.

He urged other dentists to volunteer at DVI. "You will be glad that you came," Dunec said.

Stan Jacobson, chair of Canadian Friends of DVI, told The CJN that DVI sponsors an annual classical musical soirée in the fall to "raise money for this worthwhile charity."

Camp Kadimah to host Sderot teens

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

Ten youngsters from Sderot will spend six weeks at Camp Kadimah in Nova Scotia this summer.

The children, who are ages 13 to 16 and from an area in Israel under constant missile attacks from Gaza, will experience "a closeness to nature and the outdoors, a means to be closer with themselves and their feelings, without the barriers and conceptions they deal with at home," said Hedai Offaim, director for Israel programs with Canada Israel Experience (CIE) of UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC).

"Another benefit is the opportunity to interact with Kadimah campers and staff. From past experience, we see by the end of camp that the strength of the bonds will be incredible," he added.

Offaim said most of the children have not had the opportunity to travel before. "Camp Kadimah leadership is making an extra effort to allow this incredible gift that will benefit the children from this experience."

In the each of the last 10 years, Kadimah has hosted four children from the north of Israel. Two summers ago, two children from Sderot were at the camp near Barss Corner, about 100 kilometres south of Halifax.

"This year, we decided to make a larger commitment to the southern area," said Michael Pink of Halifax, co-chair of the Camp Kadimah committee, with Victor Goldberg and Jim Spatz, also of Halifax. "This is what Kadimah is all about – forging relationships between children from Atlantic Canada, many from Ontario, plus those from Israel."

He said this venture piggybacks on Atlantic Canada's longtime partnership with the north of Israel, from which have come campers in their mid-teens, several of whom have returned as staff members.

"In addition, our post-counsellor-in-training-age teens spend a summer in Israel and reconnect with those who've been at Kadimah," Pink said.

He said the funding for the Sderot children comes mostly from the Atlantic Jewish community. "While the UIAFC Israeli branch and the Jewish Agency are co-ordinating the camper recruitment, we're absorbing the cost of the summer tuition [about $4,500 per child] and are canvassing our alumni and the community to support tuition and also airfare [between $20,000 and $30,000]. We've raised about half the airfare."

'We see by the end of camp that the strength of the bonds will be incredible'

Offaim said other Canadian camps sponsor Israeli youngsters. "However, Kadimah's effort is unique because, [Atlantic Jewish Council] executive director Jon Goldberg is personally involved with the selection process in Israel and the smooth absorption in camp. His involvement is extremely meaningful for the parents and the local communities surrounding Gaza, in knowing that their children are taken care of by him personally. That adds to the credibility of the program and lessens the worries to the parents."

He said Kadimah has included another unique element to the program.

"An adult Israeli chaperone/educator will be in charge of the kids during the entire stay. This creates the most supporting and secure environment for the kids and helps them cope with a new, and strange, experience."

CIE, the informal educational arm of UIAFC, is responsible for the entire process and creates both an educational and logistical environment. CIE staff and educators meet with the participant and parents, lead an educational process prior to camp as well as after their return to their homes, and take care of all the logistical and security arrangements.

Tal-Ya Water makes the most of dew

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel21c

JERUSALEM — The ancient Israelites used stones to collect dew from the air, and now the modern ones are taking the idea further.

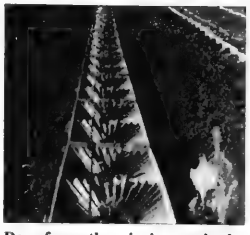
Avraham Tamir, the founder of a new Israeli company, Tal-Ya Water Technologies, has developed a technique that uses dew to water crops, a method that can be used where water resources are scarce.

Tal-Ya grows plants, at the cost of $1 each, in reusable trays that are placed on the ground. Made of recycled and recyclable plastic with UV filters and a limestone additive, the trays do not degrade in the sun or after the application of pesticides or fertilizers.

An aluminum additive helps the small trays – which are about 70 by 70 centimetres in the case of a pepper plant – respond to shifts in night and day temperature. When a change of 12 C occurs, dew forms on both surfaces of the Tal Ya tray, which funnels the dew and condensation, through a hole in the centre, straight to the plant and its roots.

The trays are also made in larger sizes for trees, Tamir told ISRAEL21c.

"Using our system has a number of benefits," Tamir said. Farmers don't need to worry about weeds because the trays block the sun, so weeds can't take root.



Dew from the air is caught by Tal-Ya Water Technologies' plastic trays and funnelled straight to the plant.

"Farmers need to use much less water, and in turn much less fertilizer on the crop," he added. Fewer fertilizers and pesticides means that less groundwater contamination takes place.

According to tests done by the Israeli Ministry of Agriculture, up to 50 per cent of irrigated water can be saved by using the Tal-Ya system.

"Dew collection starts at night," Tamir said. "The critical mass goes down below," he added, pointing to the serrated edges of the trays.

"If it rains, we can amplify one millimetre of rain so that it equals 27 millimetres."

Water from dew and condensation is, in effect, distilled water. Adding it to the soil alleviates the salinity caused by irrigation.

> 'Farmers will need much less water'

The trays also protect crops from extreme shifts in temperature, which occur in such countries as Canada or the United States, where late and early season frosts put some crops at risk.

"The amount of water collected depends on location," Tamir said. Humidity factors, temperatures and precipitation are important to consider.

Research to help build Tal-Ya, which means "God's dew" in Hebrew, was done by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Ministry of Agriculture, the Volcani Institute and Ben-Gurion University.

Tal-Ya launched its new watering system at the Agritech exhibition in Tel Aviv in May. Tamir said he is now selling the method to Israeli farmers, and he hopes to get international customers from the United States.

Torah teacher who 'reintroduced the old'

By SHOSHANA KORDOVA
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

We've all been told not to judge a book by its cover, but as it happens, the cover of Nehama Leibowitz: Teacher and Bible Scholar is quite instructive, especially when compared with another recent book on the same subject.

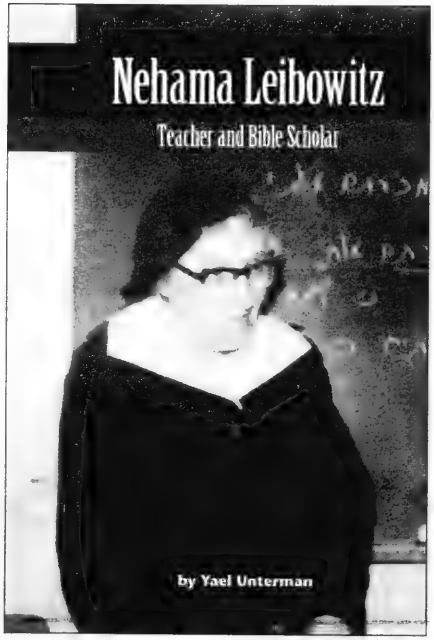
On the front of Yael Unterman's English-language book (Urim Publications) is a fuzzy photograph of an elderly Leibowitz standing in front of a blackboard, her face dominated by the thick black rim of her glasses and her hair modestly concealed beneath her signature beret.

By contrast, the cover of a recently published Hebrew-language biography features a crisp image of Leibowitz as a young, smiling woman, her heavenward gaze unmediated by spectacles as a breeze ruffles her unrestrained hair.

And indeed, Hayuta Deutsch's Hebrew book Nehama: The Life of Nehama Leibowitz (Yedioth Ahronoth Books and Chemed Books, 2008) allows the reader to see just how the old woman, the one remembered, respected and loved by the many former students quoted in Unterman's book, went from being the young Nehama facing the wind to the venerated, yet eminently accessible Torah scholar and role model she became.

Though Deutsch's book more or less glosses over Leibowitz's role in Diaspora Judaism, it is much more of a classical biography than Unterman's: it progresses in chronological order and puts Leibowitz's accomplishments squarely in the context of her family (including her outspoken and controversial philosopher-scientist brother, Yeshayahu Leibowitz) and of the events and prevailing trends in her native Europe and adopted homeland of Israel, lending an added depth to the reader's understanding of where Leibowitz was coming from.

The first section devotes a single cursory chapter to Leibowitz's youth, from her birth in Riga, Latvia, in 1905, all the way through to her early years in Mandatory Palestine, where she moved in 1930 with her husband, her father's younger brother, Yedidyah Lipman Leibowitz. (Though there has been much speculation about the reasons behind Nehama Leibowitz's marriage to an uncle three decades her senior with whom she never had any children – including the possibility that she was motivated by an altruistic decision to take care of him without violating the religious strictures that would otherwise have prohibited her from touching him – Unterman concludes that the two married for love.)



Unterman's book, however, is in part a kind of oral history based on the memories of English speakers who knew Leibowitz. In that sense, it resembles a 2003 English-language book called Tales of Nehama: Impressions of the Life and Teachings of Nehama Leibowitz, by Leah Abramowitz (Gefen), which Unterman cites. Though the new volume is the more sophisticated and analytical of the two, both authors make it clear that their books reflect, as Unterman puts it in her introduction, "more than how Nehama actually was, how she is remembered – a composite remembering based on each person's own Nehama." (Unterman explains in a reader's note that her use of Leibowitz's first name "is not meant disrespectfully, but is in keeping with her own insistence that she be called 'Nehama' by all.")

Unfortunately, some of the people she cites are identified (at least initially) only by name, leaving it to the reader to guess whether the people being quoted were students of Leibowitz's and whether they are reliable sources. They are sometimes identified more fully later on, and there are references to quotes, biblical passages and ideas that are distractingly repeated throughout the book, giving rise to the suspicion that after almost a decade of grappling with the subject matter, Unterman had difficulty figuring out exactly how to structure all the material.

The reader gets the impression that various sections of the book were moved around throughout the writing and editing process, without the final product getting the vetting necessary to make for a smoother read.

Even though identification of the interviewees is often scant to non-existent, those who travel in English-speaking modern Orthodox circles will probably recognize at least some of the names in any case (two former teachers of mine were quoted at length and, in the interest of full disclosure, let me say here that my husband's name appeared in the rather extensive list of acknowledgments).

The more biographical section of Unterman's book, which is the third volume in Urim Publication's Modern Jewish Lives series, also discusses some of Leibowitz's major achievements, like her gilyonot, the worksheets in which she posed questions of varying difficulty on the weekly Torah portion and which she mailed out to respondents all over Israel and abroad.

This was significant in that it provided a forum for Torah study, not only for the learned, but also for those who were unwilling or unable to attend traditional Torah classes, including soldiers deployed to Israel's borders, avowedly secular kibbutz members and working-class people like the cabdrivers who played a prominent role in the many stories Leibowitz liked to tell as a way of bringing her lessons to life with dramatic flair.

"In her day, Nehama functioned as a bridge between two worlds, connecting religious and secular Israeli populations to one another's values – to Zionism and to tradition, respectively," Unterman writes. "She introduced secular Israelis to traditional commentaries, demonstrating to the university-educated that the Tanach [the Hebrew acronym for Torah, Prophets and Writings] could be an accessible and enlightened text, while those from very traditional homes, such as the members of the old Yishuv [Jews living in Palestine before the Zionist settlement] and the simple Zionist labourers, had their eyes opened to the riches of the Tanach and to analysis of the commentaries, as well as to modern ideas and scholars."

The extensive time and effort Leibowitz spent marking the answers to thousands of worksheets mailed to her over several decades, asking only for postage so that she could send back her responses, was a sign of her dedication to her students, many of whom she had never met, and to her steadfast encouragement of Torah study.

She began producing the gilyonot in the summer of 1942, when young immigrant women she had taught over the year asked her for more work. Though she stopped creating new ones in 1971, she continued to send and receive existing worksheets, and had marked more than 40,000 of them by 1986.

The gilyonot also showcase a major element of Leibowitz's educational philosophy, in that they asked questions that challenged people to think for themselves. A teacher of teachers, Leibowitz – a professor in Tel Aviv University's education department and the recipient of the Israel Prize in Education in 1956, though she modestly downplayed her scholarship and disdained honours – was unabashedly critical of teachers who bored their students by asking them to regurgitate factual information.

She was renowned for popularizing the question "What's bothering Rashi?" and compelling students to look behind the words of the medieval biblical commentator and critically examine both the exegesis and the passage being interpreted, in order to uncover the textual difficulty that prompted Rashi's remarks.

Unterman quotes Israel Rozenson, the rector of Efrata Teachers College in Jerusalem, as saying of Leibowitz: "She played a vital role in the battle to prevent the decline of traditional commentary into an assortment of random explanations often left to the mercies of various sermonizers; and in turning it into a 'science' with stringent methodological requirements."

"From this we learn," Unterman writes, "that not all revolutions introduce the new – Nehama's revolution reintroduced the old, though in a new way."

Indeed, Leibowitz played an important part in "restoring the Tanach to its rightful place in the centre of Jewish study," at a time when it was relegated to a few pages of Talmud in the yeshiva world, to archeological and historical aspects in the secular world, and to the secular curriculum even in religious public schools in Israel.

"The widespread interest she generated in Tanach and commentaries and her new approach to them was tantamount to a movement," Unterman writes, noting that this particularly benefited women, who were barred from the world of Talmud when Leibowitz began teaching.

"She receives much credit for the fact that today, Tanach and commentaries are widely studied in schools and private homes."

This "movement" affected Jewish studies both in Israel and abroad. Though Leibowitz was adamant that Torah classes be taught in Hebrew, and she regularly turned down speaking invitations abroad because she didn't want to leave Israel, she did teach many native English speakers who are themselves teachers, thus extending her influence to the next generation.

And though Leibowitz was initially resistant to writing her Studies series of insights into the weekly Torah portion and to having her writing translated from the Hebrew, the English translation of the series has resulted in a widespread familiarity abroad with Leibowitz's name and work, to the point that whereas her brother, as Unterman points out, is the more well-known Leibowitz in Israel, hers is the better-known name abroad.

It can be argued that Leibowitz has also done an enormous amount to show women that they too can be recognized as Torah scholars in the Orthodox world. She was in favour of women studying Talmud, which has since become de rigueur in some Orthodox institutions, and refused to be treated any better than other women, announcing upon arrival at a yeshiva where she was about to give a class that "if all the women are over there behind the curtain then I must join them!" – at which point, the women moved into the men's section so the lesson could begin.

In addition, Leibowitz never took an interest in cooking or cleaning, leaving it to her housekeepers, with whom she developed close relationships.

But at the same time, she rejected the idea of women taking on commandments or practices that are customarily seen as the man's province. She refused to speak from the synagogue dais, was strongly critical of women's prayer groups and could not understand why women would want to wear tzitzit or lay tfillin.

Unterman writes that "in Nehama's own eyes, she was not a feminist of any stripe, and she adamantly refused to be classified as one. She saw herself as a teacher, and any other title or agenda was extraneous."

Leibowitz also explicitly said she would have given up a life devoted to scholarship in order to have a child, and responded to a disparaging comment regarding women who choose children over career by saying: "Do you think I'd be writing these gilyonot if I had children?"

Whether or not Leibowitz can or should be seen as a feminist role model, she was certainly seen as both a pedagogical and a personal one, legendary for her warmth, humour, humility and a material simplicity that shocked many of the American students seeing the cramped apartment of her later years for the first time. ("She slept on a shelf!" Unterman quotes one astonished student as saying.)

The question of whether Leibowitz – who died in 1997 at the age of 92 – can or should be seen as a Bible scholar in the academic sense, given university Bible departments' emphasis on the biblical criticism she opposed, is rather less interesting, but the author devotes three chapters to the subject.

Leibowitz did address the seeming repetitions and contradictions in the Bible (as did the commentators she analyzed), but she did so by reading the text closely to draw psychological and ethical insights from the differences and similarities of different passages relating to the same subject.

While Leibowitz – whom Unterman describes as a literary Bible scholar rather than a critical one – operated from the traditional Jewish assumption that the Torah's source is divine, some Bible critics use such textual difficulties to bolster their theory that the Bible was authored by different people at different times.

The length of the author's discussion of this issue is presumably related to the fact that, as she notes, much of the material comes from her thesis for the Israel branch of Touro College, where Unterman earned a master's degree in Jewish history; she also has a master's in creative writing and a bachelor's degree in psychology and Talmud, all from Bar-Ilan University.

Overall, Unterman's familiarity with her material, extensive interviews and clear writing come through in her book, though those qualities do not preclude the need for a more tightly edited volume. Those who can read Hebrew and are interested in a comprehensive and telling biography of Leibowitz's life are advised to pick up Deutsch's book. But Nehama Leibowitz: Teacher and Bible Scholar is a worthy read for English speakers looking for a critical and in-depth analysis of Leibowitz's beliefs and writings, as well as insight into the way her students viewed their revered teacher.

A vision of a scientific superpower

By EHUD GAZIT
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

It's still hard to write about Prof. Ephraim Katzir in the past tense. Very few people kept their wits and deep desire for science at such an advanced age and in such difficult physical condition. I vividly recall our talks in his last few months, in which he evinced amazing expertise about cutting-edge scientific developments in nanotechnology and brain science, and astounded me with his clear and precise insights.

It is said of the sages that "as they age, their wisdom grows," and Katzir was truly a scholar who grew in wisdom.

But that's just one aspect of his complex personality. He was a scientific genius who laboured for the defence of the State of Israel far from the ivory tower; a man who lost his beloved brother, Aharon, in a terror attack, yet remained committed to peace; a man who outgrew his socialist adolescence and founded Israel's defence and biotechnology industries; an outstanding researcher who was at home in the world's most prestigious scientific institutions, as well as in the ORT Braude Academic College of Engineering in Carmiel; and finally, a true academic who answered the prime minister's call and became a president and statesman.

One of Katzir's most special and impressive traits was his ability to blend vision and action. He viewed the Zionist enterprise and the establishment of the State of Israel as the central mission of scientists and researchers. Even though scientific research was his main pursuit and a cornerstone of his identity, he understood the importance of integrating science into the country's institutions and government.

As a military man he served as commander of the scientific corps. He invented the post of chief scientist in government ministries, served as the Defence Ministry's chief scientist and was involved in establishing the National Council for Research and Development.

Ephraim and Aharon Katzir also understood the importance of maintaining an intimate and ongoing relationship not only with the state's institutions and government ministries, but also with the political echelon. They were in direct and close contact with politicians and didn't hesitate to engage in party activism.

Aharon Katzir was instrumental in drawing up the platform for David Ben-Gurion's new Rafi during the 1965 Knesset elections, in which the party called for the "scientification" of the State of Israel, due to its lack of natural resources but wealth of human capital. Despite the contributions of such great minds, Rafi won only 10 Knesset seats and found itself in opposition, and well before its time, scientification was reduced to a pragmatic ideology best known in history books.

What aspects of Katzir's legacy can we implement today? The most important thing is to understand that the scientist's role is serving the public. As important and fascinating as it may be, science is only part of an academic's job. Our role as scientists is to be at the forefront of Israeli achievement in every realm: education, research, industry, policy and security.

We must pass the scientific knowledge we are developing on to society and industry. A society where academics are active partners in running the country is a better society, and can bring prosperity for the State of Israel.

Prof. Ehud Gazit is vice-president of research and development at Tel Aviv University and chairman of its nanobiology department.

New group hopes to make peace through business

By DANIEL BEN-TAL
Israel21c

JERUSALEM — Most Israelis raise an eyebrow when they learn how much Israel already trades with the Palestinian Authority: of some 15 billion shekels (about $4 billion US) worth of sales in 2008, about 13 billion shekels was with the West Bank and an estimated 2 billion shekels was with the Gaza Strip. Sales in the opposite direction account for less than 20 per cent of bilateral trade.

"Israeli companies sell millions of dollars of merchandise to the Palestinians," says Ofir Gendelman, CEO of the new Israeli-Palestinian Chamber of Commerce (IPCC).

"Most of the products sold in Palestinian markets are Israeli. West Bank supermarkets stock mainly goods made by Israeli companies, such as Osem, Strauss and Elite. Some Israeli companies rely on the Palestinian market. For the Palestinians, most trade at the end of the day is with Israel. The two economies are already interdependent," he says.

"Our job is to facilitate trade between Israel and the Palestinian Authority – to help Israeli businesspeople find Palestinian partners," he adds.

The idea of setting up an Israeli-Palestinian chamber of commerce was first discussed eight years ago, but as Gendelman, who is fluent in Arabic and English, says: "There was always a political reason not to do so."

The chamber was finally established on paper last October, registered as a private non-profit organization with the backing of 30 prominent Israeli businesspeople.

An incubation process followed, led by the Peres Center for Peace and later developed through cooperation with the Federation of Israeli Bi-National Chambers of Commerce and support from the Portland Trust. Founders include former MK Dalia Rabin, daughter of former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, and former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Amnon Lipkin-Shahak.

In February, the Peres Center organized a successful business conference on the road to the IPCC's establishment, the first in a planned series of meetings between Israeli and Palestinian professionals.

About 60 businesspeople from both sides attended the event, from the importing, exporting and shipping sectors. Participants including representatives from Ashdod Port Company, Israeli Customs and the Civil Administration allowed for information sharing on common issues of concern.

The new chamber became operational in March, and recently held its inaugural gala dinner at a Tel Aviv hotel, attended by dignitaries including President Shimon Peres; the Quartet's envoy to the Middle East, former British prime minister Tony Blair and his wife Cherie; foreign ambassadors, and Palestinian and Israeli business leaders.

The chamber's job is to function as a focal point for Israelis interested in penetrating the Palestinian market – that means focusing on the nitty gritty of doing business, while maintaining close government contact on the economic, legal and commercial facets in order to ease barriers to trade.

"We have already organized several business-to-business meetings on both bilateral and tri-national tracks. Sometimes it's easier for all sides concerned to work through a third party," Gendelman, who previously served with Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs for 11 years as a career foreign service officer, explains.

He points out that the chamber of commerce is already working with the Canadian and Japanese embassies in Tel Aviv and will hold a trilateral business-to-business event in co-operation with the Canadian Embassy this month, and a similar event with the Japanese Embassy in July.

Trust is a crucial issue.

"Sometimes it's better to work with a chaperone," Gendelman explains. "It makes them feel more relaxed. If there is real chemistry, companies can work together. We're exploring this model, but eventually we want to work on the bilateral track alone.

"You cannot detach commerce from politics," he adds, bluntly.

At the recent inaugural event, Blair, the keynote speaker, spoke of a three-tier vision of economics, politics and security for both Israelis and Palestinians, adding that the economic dimension is critical for peace.

"Economic growth and enterprise could play their part in the realization of [peace] aspirations," he told delegates. "Business can transcend the divide."

At the event, Vice-Prime Minister and Minister for Regional Development Silvan Shalom addressed the importance of reaching peace with the Palestinians, noting that economics and politics should work hand-in-hand and moderate Arabs must be supported. "Today, we are making history," he said.

Gendelman envisages the IPCC operating along similar lines to that of the 45 other bi-national chambers of commerce operating in Israel, so as to enhance two-way trade and investment between Israelis and Palestinians.

An organic utopia for people with special needs

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Israel21c

People with developmental difficulties are often handed the short end of the stick in life. Facilities to accommodate their needs and help them become full members of their society are improving, but still fail to give them the options that most of us take for granted.

This is not always so in Israel.

A new model for helping people with developmental disorders based on the Israeli commune idea has emerged over the last decade from the ruins of a crumbling kibbutz. Called Kishorit, the village in northern Israel has become a utopia for about 150 people with varying degrees of developmental difficulties, who have all found a home for life.

Some have autism spectrum disorders, some have schizophrenia, but as much as they can, they are all steering their own careers and planning their own social time, family life and destiny. They don't focus on their disability, but rather on what they can do.

The organic goat farm at Kishorit is the largest in Israel that sells "fair trade" milk to Harduf, the largest organic food supplier in Israel.

Members run and operate a TV station and produce films; they've built the largest organic goat farm in Israel, possibly the entire Middle East; they plant, tend to and eat food from their organic garden; and they are developing lines of toys, some of which were sold to Baby Gap last year.

Whether residents choose to live with a mate, with a friend or alone, the popular community where they live, eat, learn, work and play has become so popular that the directors no longer keep a waiting list.

Kishorit accepts and employs all members of the Israeli community, and you can find Israeli Jews, Arabs and Druze working there and enjoying the pastoral setting.

Tipper Gore, the wife of former U.S. vice-president Al Gore, came to Israel last summer with her husband, and she made a point to stop in at Kishorit, just a few miles from the Lebanese border. As a clinical psychologist, Gore was impressed by what she saw.

"This is a good model for people to know about so they can make it in other countries. In the United States, we'd love to have places like this," she said.

Dita Kohl-Roman, the director of resource development at Kishorit, is a personal friend of Tipper Gore's. Kohl-Roman says she would not have "dragged" Gore all the way to Kishorit if it wasn't something exceptional to see.

"It's not about arms or high-tech," says Kohl-Roman, who left a job working in the Israeli Foreign Affairs office to promote Kishorit.

When she first saw the community, she tells Israel21c, "it brought back the colour to my Israeli cheeks, because something here is being done right. The place resonates with so many aspects of how to do things right. It's quite fantastic."

Her brother, who has Asperger's syndrome, is now a happy member of Kishorit.

Younger members attend the Ziv Kishorit Democratic High School, the only school of its kind in Israel serving Jewish and Arab adolescents with developmental difficulties.

Recycling in the home is encouraged, and a recycling plant that produces paper bags from recycled newspapers is just one of the many "green" efforts the collective is working on.

Developing a new line of toys, possibly eco-friendly, to be marketed and distributed in the United States and Canada, is also a source of income.

In addition, Kishorit runs a large organic egg farm that produces 250,000 eggs per year for an eager market, generating extra income for the village. They have a dog kennel that produces prize-winning dogs, and horse stables for providing animal therapy to the residents and day program participants. The list goes on.

Noam Dichek, 30, was one of the first to join Kishorit. He arrived at the kibbutz 12 years ago. "When I first came, there wasn't anything," he tells Israel21c. "I started the first newspaper we have, and I built the goat farm. We have about 3,000 organic goats."

We need to pay back

Over the years, he has helped the kibbutz select the goats they would raise, and he now looks forward to making organic wine, a boutique wine, that Dichek says the kibbutz will produce in about four years when the vines can be harvested.

"People from the community will be making the wine," he says.

Now working in communications but still living on the kibbutz, Dichek takes on creative jobs like making movies and writing articles about his community in a monthly newsletter. Being there also helped him fulfil a lifelong dream of publishing a book, something he'd been working on since he was five years old. Called My Soulmate, the Hebrew book is based on a diary that he kept over the years.

A dog kennel at Kishorit produces prize-winning dogs and also provides animal therapy to the residents and day patients.

It was Dichek's family who pushed the government to include the kibbutz in its subsidy basket, and today members' disability subsidies go to maintaining their daily lives, while additional income from the factories and farms helps them build new programs and infrastructure.

The government of Israel also recently agreed to provide funding to build new infrastructure for an Arab kibbutz, built along the same concepts, to serve the distinct language and community needs of Israel's Arab population.

While Dichek is a busy and active member of the kibbutz, not everyone there has the ability to work, he explains. "Most of the members are working in plastics or in toys, or with the goats or horses. But not everyone works. My best friend sleeps," he says.

He also makes it a point to mention that his social worker is from the Druze community and that he has Arab friends from throughout the Galilee region. This is exceptional considering that, in most cases, the Arab and Jewish communities in Israel tend to remain distinct and separate.

Some parents enjoy the Kishorit community so much that they are planning to build their own community for staff and family nearby.

Kishorit was founded in 1997 by Shuki Levinger a social worker by training, and Yael Shiloh, an artist. Shiloh had married a man with a developmentally disabled son who was a patient of Levinger's.

Remembering the warm community she'd been brought up in at Kibbutz Kfar Szold in Israel, Shiloh wanted to build a similar environment for people like her husband's son, to give them the sense of community they did not have.

"There are a few angles here," Kohl-Roman says. "Everything comes out from this foundation of special needs, but [this community] is much bigger than special needs. Through them, we go to [issues of] sustainability, ecology and coexistence with our neighbours. The people who established Kishorit did it because they wanted them to live like you and I."

Kohl-Roman believes Kishorit is a model community that everyone could dream of living in.

"People with special needs are here to give us some kind of a lesson: we need to pay back and we need to give them more than we are giving ourselves," she says.

As a home for life, including old age, which is a very comforting promise to the parents of the members, Kishorit is now building a facility to accommodate seniors.

"A very important basic here is the community," Kohl-Roman says. "Every member is doing what they can. They will choose their work and will move to different professions until they find something that fits.

"At every point in their life, they will get what they need. The community here is the sum bigger than its parts. You belong in a place you are proud of, you can find what you like to do."

Recognizing a connection between environmental health and the increased incidence of disorders such as autism in children, the founders of Kishorit believe it's important that the members are exposed to the highest quality food, esthetics and environment.

Building with, on and from the local environment, Kohl-Roman expects this special community for special people will be copied widely in the United States and around the world.

ISRAEL HONOURS RIM FOUNDER: Last week at the Canada Telecom Summit, representatives of the government of Israel presented Michael Lazaridis, centre, founder and president of Research In Motion (RIM), with a certificate recognizing the Waterloo, Ont.-based company for its role as a strategic partner for Israeli high-tech firms. In presenting the document, signed by Israel's science and technology minister, Daniel Hershkovitz, Israel's consul for economic affairs Jonathan Levy, right, said Lazaridis and RIM are "synonymous with innovation, excellence and years of vision and success." The presentation took place prior to Lazaridis' keynote address at the Toronto conference, which brought together more than 500 industry leaders. Pictured with Lazaridis and Levy is Israel's consul general in Toronto, Amir Gissin. Please see story on page 14. [Michal Tomaszewski photo]

Italian deputies learn about Jewish refugees

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Libyan strongman Moammar Gadhafi was in Italy last week, ostensibly to mend fences and pave the way to improved diplomatic and economic relations.

While the Italian government has pledged $5 billion (US) to Libya as restitution for the colonial period, Jewish advocates were wondering why the North African country has not done the same for the Jews it mistreated.

Last week, a foreign affairs committee of the Italian Chamber of Deputies (parliament) heard testimony outlining how Arab countries – including Libya – disenfranchised and expelled their Jewish citizens following the creation of the State of Israel.

Israel says Iranian bomb possible in two months

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Iran's nuclear weapons program may be closer to completion than anyone realizes.

Leading a diplomatic delegation through Toronto last week for official meetings, Jonathan Miller, bureau head and senior deputy director general for Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, told The CJN that the world now faces "an extremely decisive moment," because within the year, Iran will likely be producing nuclear weapons-grade uranium.

Miller said that according to intelligence reports, speculation is that Iran could have enough fissile material for one nuclear bomb in as little as two months time.

A recent International Atomic Energy Agency report stated there are more than 7,000 centrifuges in Natanz, Iran. Out of those, around 5,000 are operational, which represents a leap in Iran's capability to activate its centrifuges and enrich uranium at an increased rate, Miller said.

Those centrifuges have theoretically now produced 1,339 kilograms of low-enriched uranium, just under the amount – anywhere from 1,500 to 1,700 kilograms – that experts say is needed to create enough "military-level enriched" uranium for a nuclear bomb, according to Miller's calculations.

"In the next few months, [Iran] will have enough fissile material for a 'breakout scenario'" wherein it could, if it chose to, declare itself capable of producing a nuclear weapon. "This is a very significant landmark," he said.

News reports last week cited the head of the Mossad, Meir Dagan, as speculating that Iran could "have a bomb to launch by 2014" if its program doesn't experience "any glitches," seemingly contradicting Miller's claims.

The News in Brief

Canada

Senate Passes Bill

OTTAWA — A private member's bill that would add suicide bombing to the Criminal Code definition of terrorism passed the Senate unanimously last week. The bill, introduced by Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein, now moves to the House of Commons, where it appears to have the support of the Liberals and Conservatives. Supporters of the bill, including Canadians Against Suicide Bombing, are seeking all-party backing to ensure it passes quickly.

World

Jews Cancel Events

TEHRAN — The Jewish community in Tehran cancelled social and educational programs out of safety concerns during ongoing unrest. Sources close to Iran's Jewish community told JTA via e-mail that there have been no injuries or threats to Jews or Jewish property, but the measures were precautions after protests following President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's recent re-election.

'Kosher' Web Search

JERUSALEM — A new "kosher" Internet search engine omits material not acceptable to haredi Jews. Koogle, a play on a traditional Jewish food and the search engine Google, was launched recently in Hebrew with an English mirror site. Koogle.co.il links to news and shopping sites that filter out items prohibited by haredi rabbis, including TV sets. It doesn't operate on Shabbat.

A Mini Madoff ?

SYDNEY — A South African-born Jewish businessman accused of defrauding hundreds of investors is rejecting comparisons with U.S. pyramid schemer Bernie Madoff. Barry Tannenbaum, 43, who now lives in Sydney, Australia, says he rejects as "conjecture and speculation" the "wild allegations" that he swindled more than 300 local and foreign investors out of $1.2 billion (US) in what's being called South Africa's biggest corporate fraud. His alleged Ponzi scheme offered up to 200 per cent annual returns. He said an audit will prove his innocence.

Group Defends Pius

ROME — A New York-based foundation says it has documents showing controversial wartime Pope Pius XII worked to aid Jews during the Shoah. Pave the Way Foundation president Gary Krupp, who is Jewish, said June 16 that 2,300 pages of documents, dating from 1940 to 1945, were found through the foundation's private research and give "strong support to the argument that Pope Pius XII… worked diligently to save Jews from Nazi tyranny." Many of the documents were found in an Italian monastery.

Abella Gets Honorary Degree

Flu Hits U.S. Camps

NEW YORK — Swine flu has hit at least three Jewish camps in the United States. The Reform movement's Camp Newman-Swig in California delayed its opening several days after 14 of 160 staff members tested positive for Influenza A. The California health department told camp officials the counsellors most likely have swine flu. The sick staff are under a seven-day quarantine at the camp. At the Conservative Camp Ramah Darom in Georgia, several campers have come down with flu, and at least two tested positive for swine flu. And at Reform's Camp Coleman in Georgia, at least 15 staff became ill, delaying that camp's opening.

Report urges York to clamp down on intolerance

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish volunteers and students who formed a commission last month to address an increase in anti-Jewish and anti-Israel incidents at York University say they hope the administration will consider its proposals to improve the quality of life for all students on campus.

In March, in the wake of increasing tensions on campus around Mideast issues, York formed the Task Force on Student Life, Learning and Community, headed by Osgoode Hall law dean and incoming provost Patrick Monahan. Its mandate is to examine tolerance and diversity on campus.

Last month, the task force asked members of the university community to submit recommendations on such issues as whether York's policies on the use of community space are appropriate and how the university should respond to intolerant behaviour that doesn't respect diverse views.

In response, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), Hillel at York and Hasbara at York formed a 10-person commission to offer Jewish community members a chance to have their voices heard on the issue.

Panel addresses anti-Israel 'crisis' on campus

Please see page 27

The commission's report, which was submitted to York's task force on June 15, made reference to "episodes of intimidation, harassment, ridicule and virulent anti-Israel sentiment" and expressed concern that the "overriding campus focus on the Israel-Palestinian conflict threatens to undermine the educational excellence of the university."

Included in the 10-page report were suggestions such as prohibiting the use of Vari Hall rotunda – York's main indoor public space – for political purposes and instead advocated using "alternative spaces for political expression."

It suggested that York "strongly sanction those responsible for any such unauthorized use," and that York's security should be empowered to issue tickets to students who violate York's code of conduct or other university regulations.

The report also referred to "abuse of the lecture podium" to call attention to professors and teaching assistants who use class time to posit personal points of view "on issues unrelated or marginally related to the course at hand, or personal opinions based on incorrect facts.

"While it is the role of a teacher to encourage critical thinking, it is not his or her role to require explicit or implicit adherence to any particular political ideology," the report said.

Daniel Ferman

York spokesperson Alex Bilyk said that Monahan would not comment separately on submitted reports, but task force members will "review [the Jewish community's proposals] in the context of their mandate.

"As you can well appreciate, there are many things going on at year-end, and we would want to give these recommendations due consideration," Bilyk said.

UJA Federation spokesperson Howard English, who was a member of the Jewish community commission, said that while all the recommendations in the report are vital to improving the atmosphere at York, the suggestion that Vari Hall become neutral territory is one of the more important suggestions.

The summer of Iran's discontent

From the editor's desk...

The streets of Tehran have become the foundry for the possibility of regime change for Iran.

The manipulation and rigging of the June 12 election were the original reason the masses took to the streets. Like an erupting volcano no longer able to control the mounting pressure of suppressed internal energy, the angry populace spewed onto the streets and some onto the rooftops like hot, flowing lava.

It is clear that the fraudulent results of the election are now but a pretext for the ongoing demonstrations. The issue has become far larger for the Iranian people than the incumbency of the president. It is now the question of changes to, if not also change of, theocratic rule.

The story emerging from Tehran is a rolling one. Events are still unfolding. That the protests have not abated more than a week after the election is shocking. No one predicted the massive manifestations on the street. The ruling mullahs certainly did not.

The ruling elite have demonstrated their willingness to exact the blood of their countrymen and women to bring the protests to an end. The police, the army, the religiously based Revolutionary Guard and the Basij (secret police) are wielding batons, teargas, power hoses and guns. As of this writing, at least 50 people have been killed by the government, according to JTA. Whether the blood continues to flow will be decided by the courage and resolve of the protesters and the willingness of the police and the army to continue their roles in the fratricide.

We can expect the mullahs, however, to find religious and political justification for bludgeoning the people, even as they did for condoning the corrupt election results.

Of course, until the mullahs restore order in their domain, they will point accusatory fingers at others as well as create distractions to diffuse and diminish the West's focus on the protests.

Therefore, it was not surprising that after the outbreak of the opposition demonstrations, we read the following news reports in JTA:

• In his first public address after the elections, Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei blamed the "Zionists' evil media" for instigating the protests.

• Iran claimed to have foiled an election day plot linked to Israel to bomb crowded sites in Tehran. Iran's intelligence ministry also linked the plot to America and other "foreign enemies" of Iran.

• The Iranian air force announced it would begin an extensive exercise this week in the Persian Gulf and the Sea of Oman to raise "its operational and support capability. The air force officers made sure to announce that the exercise entails long-distance flights of around 3,600 kilometres along with sophisticated aerial refuelling and low altitude flying over the waters of the Gulf to a distance of 700 kilometres.

The message in the announcement of the ranges and the altitudes of the flights was intended to reach the defence establishments of Europe, the United States and Israel: we can and we are ready to strike your targets!

International media have been barred from covering the demonstrations. And yet, due to the bravery of the protesters, the news is getting out. One of the items reported soon after the commencement of the demonstrations was that the Iranian government is using Palestinian Hamas members and Lebanese Hezbollah fighters to quell the street protests in Tehran.

According to Voice of America, there are up to 5,000 Hezbollah members bashing the heads of the protesters. A high-ranking Palestinian security official in the West Bank confirmed that Palestinian Hamas members carrying Jordanian passports were also in Tehran. There were also reports out of Tehran that Venezuela has sent anti-riot troops to Iran to suppress the protesters.

Western leaders have been unequivocal in responding to the false election results and to the fighting on the street.

Canadian Foreign Minister Lawrence Canon said he was "deeply troubled by the current situation in Iran. The allegations of fraud in last week's presidential election are serious and need to be answered. The Iranian people deserves to have its voice heard, and we call for a fully transparent investigation into electoral discrepancies.

"The banning of opposition protests and security forces' heavy-handed treatment of demonstrators throughout the country are also matters of grave concern," Cannon added.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel was the first western leader to publicly call for a recount, urging Iran also to refrain from using violence against demonstrators. "Germany is on the side of the Iranian people, who want to exercise their rights of freedom of expression and free assembly," she said in a statement last week. British Prime Minister Gordon Brown has been stinging in his criticism of the Iranian government. French President Nicolas Sarkozy described the Iranian government's handling of the street protests as "brutal and totally disproportionate.

Ironically, but not totally surprisingly, U.S. President Barack Obama's responses to the situation have been more muted than those of his western colleagues. On the weekend, he called upon Iran to halt "all violent and unjust actions against its own people." He said the United States "stands with all who seek to exercise those rights [of assembly and free speech]."

All our eyes are on the streets of Tehran in this, the summer of the Iranian people's discontent. — MBD

Zareinu launches vocational program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Zareinu Educational Centre, in conjunction with JVS, plans to launch a vocational program for high school boys with mild to moderate cognitive challenges in September.

The program is apparently the first of its kind at a Jewish school in Toronto, and likely in Canada.

"One of the things I'd like to do is make sure our high school boys, when they graduate from our program, have a set of marketable skills," the school's principal, Mitch Parker, told The CJN.

The program is for boys "because that's the population we have [for September]," he said.

Mitch Parker

As well, although the school is a community school, currently all the boys at the senior high school level are from the Orthodox community. Their curriculum next year will include half a day of yeshiva-style Jewish studies – rabbinic texts and Jewish law.

The other half of their day will have three components: vocational skill training (in areas such as job interviews, resume-writing, reading want ads), literacy training (work-related reading and math), and co-op placement in accordance with students' skills and abilities. Co-op students will have a shadow or mentor at their placements, at least initially.

The school doesn't have facilities such as metal or woodworking shops.

The Zareinu high school program, which has students ranging in age from about 14 to 22, "doesn't operate by grade," Parker said. Its senior students range from about 18 to 22 years old.

Explaining the need for the vocational program, Parker said, "This is a group of students who come from a background where study of Jewish texts is very important for them, but they don't have the skills to do it intensively.

"We wanted to make sure they would be productive members of that community."

Without a program like this, some graduates would end up being cared for by their families or in a group home, Parker said. Others would find jobs – if possible – through family connections, he added.

JVS has many years' experience supporting individuals with disabilities who are working toward employment, Reena Kronitz, JVS' chief psychologist, told The CJN.

However, "typically people come to us out of school as adults who may not have the pre-employment skills," she noted.

"By starting to equip students with a broad range of life skills and pre-employment skills, what we're trying to do is give these students a head start."

JVS is, to a large extent, developing and delivering the vocational aspect of the program, while Frontier College will be be involved in the literacy and numeracy components – reading, math and computer skills – of the program.

"I think it will be a good shidduch," said Parker, who conceived of the idea and proposed a partnership with JVS.

"It's an expensive program, but we've budgeted so that the costs [to parents] will remain the same."

Kronitz told The CJN she thinks the program is unique, exciting and "quite cutting-edge."

A vocational program that was being considered at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto a few years ago did not get off the ground because of funding issues, according to Paul Shaviv, the school's director of education.

Shaviv lauded Zareinu for its initiative and noted that vocational-type courses "can also be very valuable" for students who do not have special needs.

He added, however, that it is more difficult in the Jewish school system because of the Jewish studies curriculum that has to be covered along with general studies.

Student wins writing contest

By SHAUN SHLOMO FELDMAN

Sometimes it can be hard for us to hear the cries of those in need. Sometimes these people may not make any sound at all. Arielle Wasserman wants us to pay particularly close attention to those silent moments.

That's the 15-year-old's message in her essay Silence Has a Sound, the winning submission in the province-wide Holocaust Arts and Writing Contest, sponsored by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto. The theme of this year's event was silence.

"Silence is tangible, almost like an object. Think of it as a wide open chasm. It can be a dazzling white expanse of possibility, filled with pregnant pauses, and thoughts on the cusp of becoming words. This kind of silence is powerful and exhilarating. It is beautiful," the Grade 10 Ulpanat Orot High School student wrote.

"However, more often than not, silence is a dark, ominous cloud, stifling all that should have been said, filled with lives that never were, choices that were never made.

Three years

Three years ago today, June 25, seven Hamas terrorists crossed the border separating Gaza and Israel, killed two Israeli soldiers, injured four more and kidnapped 19-year-old soldier Gilad Schalit. He has remained in captivity ever since. In violation of the requirements of international law, not to mention the most rudimentary requirements of human decency, his Hamas captors have refused to let the Red Cross or any other aid group visit him.

Pathetically, the International Committee of the Red Cross last week pleaded with Hamas to allow Schalit's family or a humanitarian aid organization to establish contact with their captive. The Red Cross admitted both to its own impotence and to Hamas' sadism when it said that it has asked Hamas repeatedly to allow contact between the young soldier and his family, including requests "at the highest level, but these and all others have been refused." The organization knows nothing about Schalit's condition.

The organization thanked Jimmy Carter last week, the self-appointed envoy for many of the world's dictators, for trying to make contact with Schalit. "We welcome the fact that former U.S. president Jimmy Carter handed Hamas a letter from Gilad Schalit's family to him," Beatrice Megevand-Roggo, the Red Cross' head of operations for the Middle East and North Africa, said in a statement. "However, this cannot replace the regular and unconditional contacts with his family that Gilad Schalit is entitled to under international humanitarian law. The ICRC regrets that in his case, political considerations are judged more important than the simple humanitarian gesture of allowing a captive to be in touch with his family after three years of separation."

What Megevand-Roggo euphemistically calls political considerations we prefer to call simply brutality. Hamas' calculations toward Schalit are of a piece with their calculations toward the Jewish state: brazen and brutal hatred.

At a news conference in Egypt last week, after meetings with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman and Egyptian Defence Minister Hussein Tantawi, in which the subject of Schalit's release was undoubtedly raised, Israel's defence minister, Ehud Barak, said there were no new developments to report concerning progress on Schalit's release.

Israel has offered to release 1,000 Palestinian prisoners in return for Schalit, to no avail. Hamas has threatened that the Israeli will "remain imprisoned by us for eternity."

It offends the conscience, but no longer surprises, that the accusatory circles that incessantly hector and target Israel make no demands of Hamas. They shout no opprobrium at the rulers of Gaza. They shrug off the ruthlessness of the kidnappers' paymasters.

But we will never be indifferent to the fate of Gilad Schalit. Nor will we ever recoil from pointing to the hypocrisy and moral vapidity of Israel's accusers who are also Hamas' apologists.

Jewish gays, lesbians not supported

Like many other Jewish supporters of Israel, I was dismayed to read that an anti-Israel group will be marching in the Pride festival this year ("Jewish gays fight anti-Israel messaging at Pride Parade," CJN, June 11). But I think the solution to this problem lies not in the route of censorship or trying to punish Pride organizers by trying to pull their public or corporate funding. It involves a good look in the mirror for the Jewish community. Why is there only one Jewish group marching in Pride this year? Why have they only now decided to march as proud gay, Zionist Jews? Why is the Montreal Jewish Gay Pride group a only a "fledgling" organization? If as a Jewish community we had marched with gays and lesbians for years in Pride – or in the family-friendly section of Pride – under our many community banners, and if we had supported and funded Jewish gay and lesbian outreach organizations, as well as openly welcomed gays and lesbians into our shuls, schools and organizations, I think we would not be in this unpleasant situation now.

Seven Jewish Children

While columnist Yoni Goldstein is obviously sincere in his beliefs about the play Seven Jewish Children, he is wrong ("The play isn't the problem," CJN, June 11). Just two points. Saying, "Don't tell her that" does not negate what was said before: "Tell her we killed the babies by mistake… Tell her I laughed when I saw the dead policemen. Tell her they're animals living in rubble now. Tell her I wouldn't care if we wiped them out… Tell her we're better haters. Tell her we're chosen people." In the context of the script, it simply means what it says: that the parent's true feelings are to be hidden from their child. The parent's diatribe is clearly the author's perception of how all Jews feel about Palestinians. This is reinforced by the lack of a countering statement from another protagonist. The statement about "another, newer genocide of the Palestinians perpetrated by Israel" is outrageous and fallacious. There is no such genocide. Genocide is the deliberate extermination of a race or a nation. Hamas is genocidal, as are Muslims who state publicly that Israel should be wiped off the map – actually, it's not on many Arab maps – and that Jews are parasites and should be dealt with accordingly. Israel's Gaza withdrawal should be enough to demonstrate the fallacy.

Rabbis fast for Darfur

On June 18, I joined rabbis across the country in a fast of solidarity with the people of Darfur. My fast is one that thousands of people, from 35 different countries, have participated in since actor Mia Farrow started the fast on April 27.

It has been almost three months since humanitarian groups were expelled from Sudan. Across Sudan, communities that relied on aid groups now suffer without adequate food, sanitation or medical supplies. The imminent onset of the rainy season will likely lead to mass migration and water-borne disease epidemics in internally displaced persons' camps, risking the lives of more than one million people. Children will be disproportionately affected. Reports have shown sharply escalating instances of rape as a weapon of war. And in southern Sudan, recent violence threatens the stability of the whole country.

Fasting is a traditional part of Judaism, used to focus the mind on the memory of a great tragedy or to express deep repentance. But this fast is different. It's meant to address a crisis happening in our time and is an active response to ongoing tragedy. We know that it is only our failure to act for which we will have to atone.

The United Nations is working to restore humanitarian aid to Sudan and to bring about lasting peace there, but they need an international community of leaders to help them. As rabbis around North America fasted together, let us hope that our community of moral leadership will be replicated on the world stage and result in lasting relief and peace in Sudan.

I wish to trace my uncle, Ovidiu (Ovide) Feldman. Born in Iasi, Romania, in 1910, he left Romania in 1932 for higher education. He was an intern at Hotel Dieu Hospital in Bourges and obtained an MD degree from the Paris Faculty of Medicine in 1940. The last address I have for him is 25 rue Laceped, Paris. We last heard from him in 1940, from Aisne, a city north of Paris. We don't know if he was there as a private doctor or in the French army. He disappeared that year without a trace. We would appreciate hearing from anyone who has information about him.

The mystique of Winnipeg's Jewish community

By ALLAN LEVINE

Allan Gotlieb, the former Canadian ambassador to Washington, who was born in Winnipeg in 1928, was once asked at a party (according to a story related to me by McGill University sociologist Morton Weinfeld) to explain the astounding accomplishments of the city's Jews, who have never been more than five per cent of the total Winnipeg population. (And that was in 1931. Today, the Jewish population of Winnipeg is about 15,000, in a city of 650,000 people.) How did he account for the success of people such as John Hirsch, Monty Hall, David Steinberg, Izzy Asper, Gerry Schwartz, Sol Kanee, Samuel Freedman – the list seems endless? To the question, "Why Winnipeg?" he answered, "Why Athens?" Was it geographic isolation or something else?

Anthony Astrachan, the foreign correspondent for the Washington Post, thought he had figured out the enduring power of Winnipeg's Jews after visiting the city in the early 1970s. He later wrote in the U.S. Jewish magazine Present Tense that the community's celebrated vitality was based on five key ingredients: "political activism, radicalism, a vital Yiddish culture, mixed with universal Jewish devotion to education, a prairie mystique and a geographic isolation that has made Winnipeg the centre of its own Diaspora."

This had been the same thought of another notable recorder of Manitoba's Jewish past, Rabbi Arthur Chiel, spiritual leader at the Rosh Pina Synagogue during the early 1950s, who authored the first work of scholarship on the subject in his 1961 book, The Jews in Manitoba. An American, Rabbi Chiel first visited Winnipeg in 1944 and right away understood that he had arrived somewhere special. The city was, as he later put it, a "Yiddishe shtot [a Jewish or Yiddish town or village] unlike any that I had contact with in the U.S." What dazzled him was not only the number of synagogues and Jewish organizations that existed. It was also the diversity of Jewish life and opinion in this remote prairie metropolis.

Jews are "the most institutionally complete minority group in [Canada]," says Weinfeld. "For Jews, the network of such institutions spans cradle to grave (Jewish day care centres and schools to old age home and cemeteries) and all manner of cultural, social, fraternal, recreational and political interests. Nothing is left to chance."

That was as true of Winnipeg's community 100 years ago as it is today. "For a small community in the middle of nowhere, we do a heck of a job," says transplanted American Abby Morris, who has been involved with the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education and the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg for many years. "We provide the kinds of services that a community of 30,000 Jews would expect. We don't have 30,000 Jews. We have significantly fewer than that."

To outsiders, the members of the province's community were all "Hebrews." In reality by 1920, the Jews were representative of all classes and ideological orientations. Many were religious, others less so. There were Zionists who campaigned for a Jewish homeland in Palestine, socialists who fought for the rights of workers, and liberals who advocated that Jews assimilate into Canadian society. Each particular segment (and some, such as the socialists and Zionists, were internally divided) had its own associations, mutual aid societies, schools, synagogues and political clubs.

"Winnipeg was a Jewish world," reflected the well-connected lawyer and community macher Sam Drache in 1961, "that had small cells of every intellectual, controversial Jewish movement represented within it, and it had leadership – it could have one man, two men, three men, small cells but they were here and they all gave expression."

With this variety and intellectual ferment, however, came divisions, bickering and personality clashes of monumental proportions. Whether it was about synagogue prayers, kosher rules, Zionist policy, Jewish school curriculum, community governance, politics, or support for Israel, there was a definite certainty about one aspect of Jewish life in Manitoba: there was always plenty of arguing. Or, as the great Yiddish writer Sholem Aleichem pointed out, "two Jews have three opinions. When one says this, the other says, 'Yes, but not like that.'"

Chief Justice Samuel Freedman

At the root of many of these disputes was the age-old question of how to be Jewish in a non-Jewish world. The first wave of immigrants who reached Manitoba, mainly those who came from Russia in 1882 and during the ensuing decades, tended to be more traditional. They stubbornly stuck to their religious practices. This was not so much because they were more devout than other immigrants or the Anglo and German Jews who had come before them. Rather, it was an integral component of the cultural baggage they had so desperately clung to on the ships that brought them over. Moreover, they never relinquished it. They understood that success meant accepting a strong degree of assimilation – that refusing to work on Saturdays, for example, was a hindrance – but they persisted in practising their customs, regardless of the consequences. Poverty also defined them, and their ongoing adjustment to Canadian life was a difficult challenge.

After the failed 1905 Russian Revolution, the Jewish immigrants coming to Winnipeg and North America were imbued with the spirit of the Bund, the Jewish worker's political and labour movement established in Russia in 1897. They had a tremendous impact. Many of them brought a faith in Marxist and socialist principles, a love for Yiddish language and culture, and a secular rather than religious orientation to Judaism. They were the first and only generation of a true Jewish "proletariat" and were prepared to stand up for themselves in the factory, whether their boss was Jewish or not. Some were dedicated radicals. Others embraced the socialist principles of their leaders only because it provided them with the chance that their miserable lives would improve.

By the first decade of the 20th century, Yiddish had come to denote the culture, politics and passion of the newcomers. "All over North America, in the larger centres where Jews were clustered, New York, Montreal, Toronto, Yiddish books, newspapers and theatre flowered, and a lively cultural traffic took place," Harry and Mildred Gutkin have observed. "Concert artists, theatrical companies, lecturers on history, literature, philosophy, politics – all performing in Yiddish – made the rounds of Jewish communities, and Winnipeg, on the edge of the Canadian hinterland, welcomed them all with avid and overwhelming hospitality."

The one issue upon which Winnipeg Jews formed a united front was in fighting the prejudice and discrimination they faced. For more than a half of the 20th century, there were two separate worlds coexisting in the city – a Jewish one, mainly focused in Winnipeg's North End around Selkirk Avenue, and a non-Jewish one around the business district of Portage Avenue and Main Street, and points east, west and south where Jews were not invited or wanted.

As discriminatory as the anti-Semitism was, it's also true that the great irony of Jewish history is that anti-Semitism, although by no means the only factor, played a major role in Jewish survival. Without property and club restrictions, ethnic quotas and the spreading of hate propaganda, assimilation likely would have occurred at a much faster rate. At the same time, by constantly reminding at least two generations of Jews that their "Jewishness" defined them, the community's leaders and elders kept pushing, challenging the status quo and slowly advancing the cause of social justice.

As anomalous as it now might seem, the appointment of Samuel Freedman in 1952 as a judge of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench was by all accounts one of the most significant events in Manitoba Jewish history. Freedman's subsequent appointment as the first Jewish chancellor of the University of Manitoba in 1959 and his elevation to the Chief Justice of Manitoba in 1971 cracked open the doors that had been shut to Jewish lawyers and other professionals – and to Jews generally – for far too long.

With these progressive developments came changes in community attitudes, institutions and structures, not all of them welcome. The Yiddish immigrants, who populated the North End were so successful in badgering their children to obtain a solid education and enter the ranks of the professional middle class that they laid the foundations for the eventual diminution of the very Yiddish world that they had so proudly established. Hence the opening of the impressive Asper Jewish Community Campus in 1997 – and the relocation of schools, libraries and other organizational offices to the wealthier southern part of the city– was an event that was hailed by many Jews in the city, but it was also condemned by others as an omen that North End Yiddish culture was gone forever.

So to return to the baffling question, "Why Winnipeg?" One answer is simply found in the characters of the people who have lived here. They worked hard and succeeded – with many amassing fortunes beyond their wildest dreams – and they unselfishly built the Jewish community brick by brick. You can accuse these leaders of elitism and even arrogance (as many still do), but without them, there would be nothing to talk, reminisce or kvell about.

Winnipeg writer and historian Allan Levine's most recent book is Coming of Age: A History of the Jewish People of Manitoba, published by the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada in association with Heartland Associates. For more information, visit: www.jhcwc.org.

Jew-hating Jews

Whether it's protesting at a Jewish National Fund tribute dinner in Ottawa or London, sponsoring anti-Zionist speakers on our university campuses, calling for a boycott of Israeli wines outside an LCBO in Toronto, organizing an illegal sit-in at the Israeli consulate or vilifying Israel at supposedly academic forums on health care in Gaza and the West Bank, they are there, these deceitful Jews.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Israel-bashing of such intensity by Jews readily translates into a pattern of behaviour that has the ingredients of what has come to be recognized as Jewish self-contempt. It's an anomaly that is becoming increasingly prevalent not only in Canada, but across Jewish communities worldwide.

Nor is this a new phenomenon. During biblical times, and ever since, there have been pockets of Jews who have chosen to side with the enemies of their own people.

"Their successors," according to British writer and commentator Melanie Phillips, "[are] almost always on the left [politically], very often, but not always highly secularized, and with a tangential or deeply conflicted relationship with their Jewish identity, they are in the forefront of the movement to demonize, delegitimize and destroy Israel… They do it to no other country; only the expression of self-determination of their own people inspires in them such frenzied and obsessive self-loathing."

Author David Solway goes one step further in characterizing what has been described as the "pathology" of Jewish self-abhorrence. "Masking the syndrome of self-contempt as a quest for justice, these Jewish turncoats seek redemption in a denial of both history and genealogy," Solway says. "Diagnostically speaking, it is not so much a mental illness or clinical aberration we are witnessing, but a sickness in the soul supple enough to contort itself into a spurious idealism, a simulacrum of ideological nobility."

And, indeed, when engaging such Jews in any discussion of their motives and objectives, what comes across is a particular self-righteousness: they know what's good for all of us. They "claim to represent authentic Jewish morality as opposed to the supposed corruption of those principles by Zionism and Israel," Phillips writes. "They do nothing of the kind. Their claim merely advertises their profound ignorance of Jewish ethics and history, which they so badly represent."

At a time when the very fabric of Zionism is under such mounting attack and when the world's hostility toward Israel is escalating as perhaps never before, it is so sadly counter-productive to have in our midst individuals who present themselves as "Jewish" but who so relentlessly and unashamedly empower those who wish harm on Israel and anyone who supports the Jewish state.

Bibi must articulate a clear settlement policy

Since coming to power, the Obama administration has made itself clear regarding West Bank settlements. The narrative reads as follows: settlements are central to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and doing away with them will greatly advance its resolution. A link has even been made between the settlements and America's ability to deal with the threat of a nuclear Iran.

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Obama reiterated this position in his speech in Cairo on June 4, declaring that the "United States does not accept the legitimacy of continued Israeli settlements. This construction violates previous agreements and undermines efforts to achieve peace. It is time for these settlements to stop."

Ten days later at Bar-Ilan University, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu stated his position on the issue, proclaiming that Israel has "no intention of building new settlements or of expropriating additional land for existing settlements," but he added that "there is a need to enable the residents to live normal lives, to allow mothers and fathers to raise their children like families elsewhere."

Netanyahu's speech received much attention, because in it he acknowledged the Palestinians' right to a state, albeit demilitarized, while making several other important policy statements. He rightfully demanded Palestinian recognition of Israel as the Jewish state and expressed his view that Jerusalem will remain forever united, and that the Palestinian refugee question must be resolved outside of Israel.

However, in months ahead, settlements will remain central in discussions within Israel and between Israel and the parties trying to advance peace with the Palestinians, and the subject must be addressed more thoroughly.

Netanyahu's Bar-Ilan declarations won't suffice. He must place his settlement cards squarely on the table and bravely play out his hand. The alternative is having the United States or the Palestinians lead the way, with Israel playing catch-up, as has too often been the case in the past.

Engaging a clear and comprehensive vision doesn't mean acquiescing to those who would uproot every settler from the pre-1967 West Bank or to those who view any possible territorial concessions as sacrilege.

It will require a realistic re-sketching of Israel's borders, given our biblical connection to the land, security considerations, demographics and our own interest in ending more than 40 years of military control over two million West Bank Palestinians and some of their lands.

Skeptics will justly say that this is easier said than done, that it takes two to tango and that the Palestinians don't dance the same steps. They will also assert that supporters of a "Greater Israel" will rebel violently against any concessions.

It won't be easy, but my experience, primarily in my military posting as legal adviser to the Israel Defence Forces in Judea and Samaria, has made it clear to me that this issue must be embraced.

To start, Netanyahu must express the understanding that large tracts of Judea and Samaria won't remain in Israeli hands in the long term. In that vein, the message should be clearer regarding Israel's intention to allow natural growth in places that most Israelis believe will never be turned over to the Palestinians, such as the blocs around Jerusalem, the Ariel corridor and two large haredi towns, both just a half kilometre beyond the Green Line. Conversely, this policy should not be applied to settlements in the heart of the West Bank with no viable future, mostly those beyond the security barrier.

Netanyahu must also dismantle illegal (or unauthorized) outposts and take appropriate steps to ensure they're not rebuilt. They're a blemish on our society, where the rule of law must be supreme. Self-respecting states can't allow groups of citizens, as self-righteous as they might be, to dictate policy adverse to that of their government.

These outposts sprouted throughout the West Bank partly because of settler frustration, with no alternatives available to them in existing communities. Many were thrown into the waiting arms of extremists inhabiting the hillsides. A policy that gives most of them hope about their future in Judea and Samaria, as suggested, will bring some back into the fold.

Netanyahu's speech is being hailed as groundbreaking by some, as a beginning by others and as a non-starter by the Palestinians. To show that he's a true visionary, he must engage these settlement issues quickly, with integrity and candour.

Are Israel's religious wars calming down?

I am happy to report signs of tentative progress in the peace process – no, not between Netanyahu and Obama, Israel and the various Palestinian factions, or at York University.

Rather, what appears to be slow but positive movement is taking place on the haredi-secular front, which has long been a source of conflict, particularly in Jerusalem. Recent battles over the opening of a municipal parking lot on Shabbat for visitors lasted for only a week, far less than the months and sometimes years of warfare that had been waged in the past on what is supposed to be a day of rest.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The previous skirmishes were fought over stores that tried to open on Shabbat, or new roads near religious neighbourhoods (and drivers from Tel Aviv who sometimes went out of their way to provoke the black-coated residents on the seventh day).

But the underlying factors are political and social, as young leaders on both sides use the polarization to gain recognition and support in their own communities. Apparently the long hot Shabbat summer days add to the steam pressure that pushes out the young men of Mea Shearim and nearby neighbourhoods into the streets to join the violence. And in their wake, a parallel process takes place among secular groups, which form counter-demonstrations.

But this time, the new (traditional but not haredi) mayor of Jerusalem, Nir Barkat, refused to play the game. He closed the parking lot, at least for two weeks, while negotiations take place and other solutions are sought. Although he was criticized for capitulating, this may be a clever strategy to take the wind out of the sails of the young hotheads. They will probably try to find a new issue, and Barkat will need to continue to manage this social and political conflict.

The effort to reduce the level of social conflict on this issue – which has erupted periodically since, and even before, Israeli independence – extends to other areas of Israeli life. The difficulties and questions raised by re-establishing a Jewish state 2,000 years after the last attempt ended in failure (and not for the first time) are huge – and there are no good precedents.

Unlike the United States, which was founded as a secular state, for Israel, the separation of church and state is far more complicated. And among our neighbours, with various forms of Islamic regimes and very little democracy (other than Turkey), the examples are also not very helpful.

Many religious Israelis saw, and still see, the return to Zion in religious and even messianic terms. In these communities, rabbis maintain their traditional leadership roles while the secular state is viewed as a hostile force. They see religious law – or their particular versions – as binding, not only on their own communities, but also on other Jews, particularly in the areas of kashrut and Shabbat, as well as conversion and marriage. As a result, their relationship with the modern and secular democratic process, based on majority rule, is awkward, at best, and often hostile.

In contrast, many secular Israelis want to escape what they see as the limitations of religious and rabbinical authority. They want to be able to take the bus to the beach on Shabbat, or to drive their cars to Jerusalem, find a place to park, and spend time in the Old City.

Non-religious Israelis also strongly resent the stranglehold of the rabbinical establishment in the realm of "personal status," particularly marriage. As a result, many choose not to get married at all, or to leave the country to have a civil marriage, which is then recognized upon return. This is particularly true when recent immigrants from the former Soviet Union are involved.

With such difficult and divisive issues to deal with, it may be unrealistic to expect compromise and peaceful coexistence. But as time passes, there are increasing efforts to escape this cycle of conflict. We have more than enough challenges in the complex Jewish renaissance taking place in Israel, and the religious wars have become tiring.

Polish literature and the Holocaust

The Nazi genocidal plan to cleanse Poland of three million Jews was so diabolically successful that 90 percent of Poland's venerable Jewish community, once the world's second largest after that of the United States, was methodically eradicated during an abysmal six-year period.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

More than six decades after allied armies liberated German concentration camps, how does Poland pay homage to the Holocaust? Dorota Glowacka, a 48-year-old Polish scholar affiliated with University of King's College in Halifax since the mid-1990s, has taken more than a passing interest in this topic.

In 2006, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada gave her a $56,000 grant to pursue a project titled Jewish Memory in Today's Poland and the Polish National Narrative. She expects to finish a book on this subject this year.

Recently, she submitted a manuscript on representations of the Holocaust to Washington University Press. In 2007, Nebraska University Press published Imaginary Neighbors: Mediating Polish-Jewish Relations after the Holocaust, a volume of essays edited by Glowacka and Joanna Zylinska

During Holocaust Education Week in Toronto last November, Glowacka was invited to deliver a lecture on representations of the Holocaust in recent Polish literature.

Her talk was co-sponsored by the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation and the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada.

Glowacka, who left Poland in 1989 after completing an MA degree in English literature at the University of Wroclaw, focused on the post-Communist era in her lecture.

But in an interview, she talked about the two different eras in which representations of the Holocaust figure in Polish literature.

The first period, lasting roughly from the end of World War II to the fall of communism in 1989, was supplanted by the current era, which really began in the mid-1980s but that picked up a head of steam after the collapse of the Communist system.

"There are significant differences between these two periods," she said.

Under communism, the few dozen works that touched on the Holocaust, ranging from memoirs to novels, conformed to communist/internationalist ideology and thus usually avoided direct references to Jewish suffering, said Glowacka, whose parents, Wiktor and Grazyna Jassem, were members of the ruling Communist party.

"There was a legacy of forgetting, aided by the communist policy of historical amnesia," she said.

Since 1989, however, restrictions on the portrayal of the Holocaust have disappeared.

To Glowacka, Polish-style communism tapped into a deep vein of Polish nationalism, which was infused with traditional forms of anti-Semitism.

For Jews who remained in Poland after 1945 and hoped that a new era of equality had finally dawned, the re-emergence of state anti-Semitism came as a disillusioning blow.

In her view, the Polish government's decision in 1956 to reintroduce Catholic religion instruction to the school curriculum was part and parcel of that process.

Jewish students were isolated by that development.

"Jews were cast as outsiders," said Glowacka, whose father was a Jew and whose mother was a Catholic.

During her youth, a pattern emerged in which Catholics writing on the Holocaust generally tended to ignore Jewish victimhood, while Jewish writers emphasized it.

Among the Catholic writers who delved into the Holocaust were Tadeusz Borowski, Jerzy Focowski, Czestaw Milosz, Zofia Natkowska, Jerzy Andrzewski and Zofia Kossak-Szczucka.

Borowski (This Way to the Gas, Ladies and Gentlemen) was a political prisoner who was incarcerated in Auschwitz, while Kossak-Szuzucka was an anti-Semite before the war.

Of this group, Ficowski – a poet whose Jewish wife was smuggled out of the Warsaw Ghetto before its destruction– is her favourite pre-1989 interpreter of the Holocaust.

Jewish writers who dealt with the Holocaust from 1945 until 1989 include Julian Stryjkowski, Henryk Grynberg, Krystyna Zywulska (Sonia Landau), Bogdan Wojdowski, Adolf Rudnicki, Wladystaw Szpilman and Ida Fink.

The dissolution of communism coincided with a renewed interest in Poland's nearly extinct Jewish culture and I.B. Singer's winning of the Nobel Prize in literature. These events prompted Polish Catholic and Jewish writers, from Marek Bienczyk and Pawel Huelle to Hanna Krall and Wilhelm Dichter, to explore the Holocaust.

In bearing witness to the Holocaust, Catholic writers were an influential factor in ushering in attempts to "to revise dominant historical narratives and cultural paradigms, which were founded on the exclusion of the Jewish other," observed Glowacka in her paper to Holocaust Education Week.

"The perceptions of Jews throughout Poland's history have been often negative," she added. "Jews have been perceived as a threat to Polish national interests and to Polishness, which I understand, very broadly, as a mixture of fervent patriotism and strong Catholic values."

In general, even now, Poles feel uneasy about the Holocaust, said Glowacka.

"There is no comfort in it for Poles."

Although Poland, unlike France, did not have a pro-German collaborationist regime in place during the Nazi occupation, the majority of Poles were indifferent to Jewish suffering during the Holocaust, she said.

Yet other Poles were complicit in helping the Germans identify Jewish Poles, while still others went as far as to murder Jews, as in pogroms that unfolded in such towns as Jedwabne in 1941.

By contrast, some Poles participated in the rescue efforts of Jews. "Twelve Polish people, on average, were involved in rescuing one Jew," said Glowacka.

Due to these historical crosscurrents, the memories of Poles and Jews regarding the war clash.

As she writes in Imaginary Neighbors: "Polish national narratives of heroism, oppression and liberation… stand in stark contrast to the Jewish narratives of suffering, senseless death and betrayal."

Glowacka, who developed an interest in the Holocaust after leaving Poland and meeting Jews in the United States, discovered her Jewish ancestry after her father, a linguist, was expelled from the Communist party in the wake of the 1968 political upheavals.

News of his expulsion reached her school, where fellow students hurled anti-Semitic taunts at Glowacka, for whom the revelation of her Jewishness was nothing less than a rude awakening.

"My father kept my Jewish identity from me to protect me from anti-Semitism," she observed, saying that it was not until 1997 that they first talked about his background as a Jew.

Today, she noted, he takes an interest in Jewish affairs and the Holocaust.

Glowacka emigrated as communism in Poland tottered.

"I never felt at home in Poland," she explained. "I always felt I was somewhat different."

In addition, she was sick and tired of the corruption in public life and sought better professional opportunities abroad.

She began to identify with her Jewish side of her identity 15 years ago.

"For the first time, I was not ashamed to be Jewish," she said. "A lot of people like me had a deep inferiority complex on account of being Jewish."

Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund Size

Income distribution to investors is on the 15th of every month. The Fund is RRSP and RRIF eligible and is audited by KPMG.

While so many mutual funds have declined in size, the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund has tripled in just over three years. How?

First, the Romspen Fund's satisfied investors continue to increase their holdings.
Second, more and more friends and family of investors are purchasing units.
Third, new investors seeking an attractive monthly income have come on board.

Proven, consistent performance – that's why we continue to grow. Come to a New Investor Seminar, meet the management team and learn why the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund should be a trusted and reliable part of your financial plan.

Narayever votes in favour of same-sex marriage

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The First Narayever Congregation – an unaffiliated, traditional egalitarian synagogue and the largest shul in downtown Toronto – has voted overwhelmingly in favour of its rabbi officiating at same-sex marriages.

Of 175 voters on the same-sex marriage issue, which took place at the congregation's annual general meeting June 14, 164 people – 93.7 per cent – voted in favour, effective immediately.

No same-sex marriages are currently booked at the synagogue, but an aufruf is scheduled for next month. The couple will be married elsewhere by a friend, said Rabbi Ed Elkin, the Narayever's spiritual leader since 2000.

The Brunswick Avenue congregation, which began life as an Orthodox synagogue and was revitalized in the 1970s when the egalitarian services were first held, first faced the same-sex marriage issue when a lesbian couple approached Rabbi Elkin shortly after he became the shul's rabbi to ask if he would officiate at their wedding.

Instead of making a unilateral announcement, he "wanted to lead the congregation to a point where they were comfortable with it," the rabbi said in an interview.

The synagogue's board then struck a committee to examine the question of same-sex marriage.

Randal Schnoor, a Toronto sociologist whose PhD dissertation examined how gay Jewish men balance their Jewish and gay identities, recalled that the committee, which he sat on, met for a year to study Jewish texts and other literature on the issue, then issued a 40-page report.

The committee recommended to the shul's board that same-sex couples' milestones be recognized from the bimah, for example by offering an aliyah and wishing couples "Mazel tov." But there wasn't consensus on the issue of marriage, which was put to a general membership vote, as was the recognition issue.

The votes, held in 2004, resulted in an "overwhelming" majority in favour of recognition from the bimah, said Schnoor, a 40-year-old married father of two.

As well, there was a 71 per cent majority in favour of having same-sex marriages at the shul, but the constitution at the time required an 80 per cent majority. It has since been amended to 75 per cent for matters of ritual change.

Schnoor attributes the increase in acceptance of same-sex marriage in part to the December 2006 acceptance of a responsum – albeit a controversial one – by the Conservative movement's committee on Jewish law and standards that endorsed the celebration of same-sex unions in a Jewish context, as well as to the legalization of same-sex marriage in Canada in 2005.

"It's been a challenging issue for the shul," Schnoor said. "[But now that] it has such overwhelming support, I think it's not going to cause any further controversy."

The Narayever has "only a handful" of gay or lesbian congregants, said Rabbi Elkin, who was ordained in 1990 by the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College.

Demographically, the shul's almost 600 adult members range in age from their 20s to 90, but "I think we skew a bit younger than average," said the rabbi. "We have quite a few young couples, singles and young families."

"We daven from an Orthodox prayerbook, we do a full Torah reading, we daven Musaf, we have a kosher kitchen, we observe all the laws of Shabbat and Yom Tov – we don't turn lights on and off, we don't have photography, and there's no microphone," Rabbi Elkin said, explaining how tradition is expressed at the shul.

At the same time, women have "complete equality" in services and are counted in minyans along with their male counterparts.

"We're not terribly different from most Conservative shuls in the States," said the rabbi.

On the other hand, he added, "I don't know who else is exactly like us. We're kind of quirky."

It was a small group of young, heterosexual members, mostly in their 20s and 30s, who raised the issue of same-sex marriage for the second time, the rabbi noted.

Before this month's vote, the shul held two information sessions on the issue.

Rabbi Elkin told The CJN that early in his career, he wasn't sure what his stand would be on same-sex marriage.

"There were gays and lesbians in the class with us in rabbinical school. I felt they would make fine rabbis. I was glad I was studying at an institution that recognized that."

It wasn't until he attended the 2000 convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis – the Reform movement's rabbinic organization – that he reached a turning point, voting in favour of a resolution supporting the decision of individual rabbis to officiate, or not, at Jewish same-gender ceremonies.

Rabbi Elkin said he feels "very good, very proud," about the outcome of his shul's vote.

"I'm very pleased it passed so overwhelmingly, and I'm hoping that bodes well in terms of maintaining the unity of the congregation," he said. "It's a lovely, vibrant congregation. I hope and anticipate we'll continue in the same way, only we'll be fully including another segment of the Jewish community that has not been fully included to this point."

Bruce Rosebrugh, 54, who served as shul president for two years until the recent AGM, said that, "in the end, it was simple. This isn't a political statement… It's just an extension of what we are in terms of being a caring community."

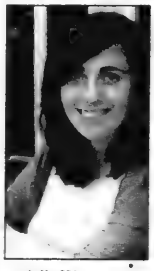
This kind of silence feeds off regret and fear, off questions that went unanswered and dreams that were unfulfilled. Silence is powerful. Silence can kill. In 1939, it almost killed a nation."



Arielle Wasserman

Regarding the world's silence during the Holocaust, Arielle wrote: "It was then that the Jews realized no one would speak for them. They had to speak for themselves."

The governments of Canada and the United States currently condemn anti-Semitism and support Israel, but she wonders if that could change.

"My only concern is that Canada and the U.S. support us now. And right now, they're great – they're pro-Israel, they're pro-Zionism. But when things get harder, when things get scarier, who knows what they're going to do?" she told The CJN.

"What was so shocking and petrifying about the Holocaust was that Germany was a civilized, westernized country – they were technologically advanced and they were well-respected. They were people just like us – it could've been any other country," Arielle said.

She said that it's also important to remember the five million non-Jews who perished during the Holocaust. "But at the same time, six million Jews makes this huge impact. And the whole point of talking about the Holocaust is to make sure it never happens again.

"Unfortunately, [many] people don't care about the 700,000 Gypsies or the blacks or the homosexuals, because it's more unrelatable, so I think we have to be incredibly careful not to diminish the enormity of the Holocaust."

Arielle said the Holocaust can help to teach future generations about the consequences of hatred and intolerance. The first part of the learning process doesn't necessarily have to be through understanding, but rather through remembering, she said.

"As long as they've done their part in remembering and therefore ensuring that it never happens again, however they get to that point is up to them."

Arielle takes advanced placement university courses in English at Ulpanat Orot. She hopes to attend Columbia University after finishing high school, both for the quality of its programs and because she loves New York.

Israel honours RIM founder at Telecom Summit

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For the second year in a row, a handful of Israeli high-tech companies staked out territory at the Canadian Telecom Summit, hoping to lay the groundwork for strategic alliances and future business deals.

At the same time, the Israel Economic Mission to Canada took centre stage at the summit – Canada's pre-eminent telecom industry gathering – by presenting Research In Motion (RIM) founder and president Michael Lazaridis with a document recognizing his contribution to bringing together the Waterloo Region technology leader and Israeli firms.

"Michael Lazaridis and RIM are both synonymous with innovation, excellence and years of vision and success," said Jonathan Levy, head of Israel's Toronto-based economic mission.

"Israel's advanced technology industry looks upon RIM as a strategic partner," Levy told representatives of 500 leading Canadian telecommunications firms at the summit, which ran from June 15 to 17. "It, too, is perceived as cutting edge and visionary industry, and as such they are a natural fit for each other."

Levy told The CJN that the government of Israel "has identified the summit as an opportunity to forge alliances and relationships between our companies and Canadian companies."

The event provides "plenty of networking opportunities" for Israeli participants, he added.

Six Israeli telecom firms participated in this year's event, down from the eight who travelled to Canada last year. Israeli corporations still see the United States, Hong Kong and Europe as the main area for expansion, but Canada is increasingly on their radar screens, Levy said.

Last year's participation spawned specific business relationships, he continued. NexPerience, an Israeli firm, followed up its summit participation with "a road show" to RIM's Waterloo, Ont., offices, arranged by the trade mission.

It later inked a deal that saw it provide a solution for testing RIM devices, allowing "the BlackBerry developer community to test software on live BlackBerry smartphones using an Internet-based service," the NexPerience website states.

This year's Israeli participants included PerSay, RAD Data Communications, Radware, TeleMessage, TTI Telecom and Comverse Technology.

Duby Yoely, vice-president of marketing and solution engineering for TTI Telecom, said the summit provided the opportunity to network, "starting to talk, looking for opportunities. It was good."

TTI already has two prominent Canadian customers for its mobile network management product, Bell Mobility and Telus. TTI believes Canada has weathered the economic downturn better than other countries, providing opportunities for it and other Israeli firms.

"Canada is a very important market for us," Yoely said. "We already have two big customers here. Despite the world recession, we see Canada as a market that is quite promising."

Adding to the Israeli presence at the summit was a keynote address by Daphna Steinmetz, vice-president and chief innovation officer of Comverse. Her presentation focused on "Communications for the '@' Generation."

Israel's information and communications technology sector was responsible for $12 billion (US) in exports in 2008, accounting for half of Israel's high-tech exports and 15 per cent of Israel's total sales abroad. Trade between Canada and Israel totalled $1.8 billion (US) in 2008.

Grant helps low-income seniors

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Harry Enchin's brother, Jonathan, died in 2005 at age 43, Harry wanted to do something that would have made his brother proud.

A year ago, he set up the Jonathan Enchin Community Fund, administered by Kehilla Residential Program and directed at low-income seniors.

Jonathan Enchin

Along with a matching one-time, three-year grant from the Weinberg Foundation, a U.S.-based charitable foundation – the grant proposal came from Kehilla – the fund allots 25 seniors $1,240 each per year.

Recipients are referred to Kehilla from Jewish Family & Child, Circle of Care, Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

Lisa Lipowitz, Kehilla's director of community initiatives, said cheques go out quarterly and are usually timed to be delivered around the Jewish holidays.

"Many seniors live on fixed incomes. They can't afford to pay for rent, food and medical supplies, and practise Jewish customs such as keeping kosher," she said.

"This small increment can be a huge benefit. The holidays can be expensive."

Nancy Singer, executive director of Kehilla, called it a "feel good program. Harry's brother had an affection for seniors, and this is a meaningful way to honour his memory. I would like to see it keep going [after the three years.]

"Time passes quickly, and the recipients know it is a one-time grant. I'd like to see donors get interested. We now help 25 people. It would be great to be able to help more."

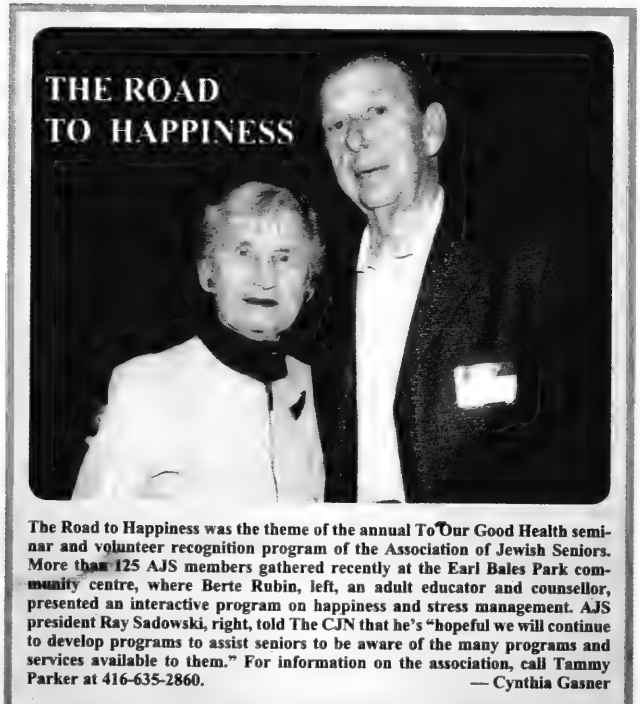
Enchin said his brother was particularly tuned in to the plight and needs of seniors.

"He helped them in his apartment building by shopping, running errands and generally looking out for them, and he volunteered at Baycrest," he said.

"This is something he would have done, if he had had the means. It is something that was near and dear to his heart. The money can help [recipients] buy some kosher food and feel a part of the community," Enchin said.

Several recipients have contacted Kehilla to thank them for the money, Lipowitz said.

One thanked Kehilla for helping that person to celebrate the High Holidays, and another said that it was touching "to get help from complete strangers. It is absolutely amazing that there are donors who care about [us]. This allowance will help enhance our lives."



The Road to Happiness was the theme of the annual To Our Good Health seminar and volunteer recognition program of the Association of Jewish Seniors. More than 125 AJS members gathered recently at the Earl Bales Park community centre, where Berte Rubin, left, an adult educator and counsellor, presented an interactive program on happiness and stress management. AJS president Ray Sadowski, right, told The CJN that he's "hopeful we will continue to develop programs to assist seniors to be aware of the many programs and services available to them." Jewish Life

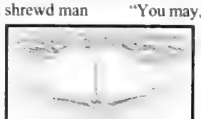
Follow the leader – he needs you

By RABBI AVROHOM JACKS



Rabbinic Reflections

There was a time in the 1940s when Vyacheslav Molotov was Soviet foreign minister. He was a shrewd man and a hard bargainer, but he worked for Joseph Stalin, who was, without a doubt, the boss.

A reporter once overheard him talking to Stalin by trans-Atlantic telephone during the course of some very intricate negotiations with the West.

He said, "Yes, Comrade Stalin," in quiet tones, then again, "Yes, Comrade Stalin, and then, after a considerable wait, "Certainly, Comrade Stalin.

Suddenly he was galvanized into emotion. "No, Comrade Stalin," he barked, "No. That's, no. Definitely, no. A thousand times, no!"

After a while, he quieted and it was, "Yes, Comrade Stalin," again.

The reporter who overheard this was probably never so excited in his life. Clearly, Molotov was daring to oppose the dictator on at least one point, and it would surely be important to the West to know what that point might be.

The reporter approached Molotov and said, as calmly as possible, "Secretary Molotov, I could not help but hear you say at one point, 'No, Comrade Stalin.'"

Molotov turned his cold eyes on the reporter and said, "What of it?"

"May I ask," said the reporter, cautiously, "what the subject under discussion was at that time?"

"You may," said Molotov. "Comrade Stalin asked me if there was anything he had said with which I disagreed."

After an unsuccessful rebellion launched by Korach in this week's parshah was miraculously put down, Moses instructed each tribe's leader to take their staff and place it before the mizbeyach – the altar. The rods were left overnight. The next morning, Aaron's had miraculously sprouted blossom buds and bore ripe almonds. The staffs of the other tribes' leaders remained dry wooden sticks.

This was a clear sign once and for all that the mantle of leadership justifiably belonged to Aaron. Never again would this reality be contested.

Yet, the Sefas Emes notes a very interesting nuance in the text. In verse 21 of chapter 17, the Torah tells us that "the staff of Aaron [was] among their staffs."

Why is the Torah stressing this point? From the context of the story, it was obvious that Aaron's staff was included in the 12 staffs that were placed before the altar.

Perhaps the Torah is teaching us a profound lesson about leadership. While it's true that some people are born leaders, they can't accomplish anything without the help and support of the rest of us.

Someone once said that leaders are a lot like the letter "Q." They can't spell anything without "U"! As legs support the relatively more important organs of the upper body, so, too, must we support our leaders. For great things to be accomplished, we need the involvement of everyone.

One of the gravest mistakes a person can make is to say, "I'm not very talented. What could I possibly accomplish? I would rather leave the community activism to the people who wield the greatest influence and power."

When we think such thoughts, we need to remember that Adam, the first man, was created alone to teach us – his descendants – that we can't rely on others to do the job. We need to act for ourselves.

One of the central messages of Judaism is that we rely on our leaders to show us the way, but they rely on us, too. They rely on us to be their arms, eyes, legs and hands to get the job done. They rely on us to be the foot soldiers that wage the daily battles on behalf of all that is holy, true and right.

When they call, let us answer with a resounding, "Yes!"

Summer reads for Jewish bookworms

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Despite this chilling caution issued last year by Steve Jobs, co-founder and CEO of Apple, that "it doesn't matter how good or bad the product is, the fact is that people don't read anymore," I'm going to venture forth with this year's summer reading suggestions for the Jewishly interested. As usual, I have tried to discuss books that are a bit under the usual radar in terms of popularity.

The Kogod Library of Judaic Studies continues to deliver books of high quality and thoughtfulness. One such offering is the just released Judaism and the Challenges of Modern Life, edited by Moshe Halbertal and Donniel Hartman and containing essays by well-known Judaic scholars. Divided into three sections covering what the editors term the challenge of ideas, of diversity and of statehood, this volume probes the relationship between Judaism and homosexuality, science, feminism, pluralism, war and peace, and human rights, among other things.

The Quest for Authenticity is an important elaboration of the life and work of Reb Simcha Bunim, one of the great chassidic masters. Written by Rabbi Michael Rosen, the beloved leader of the Yakar minyan in Jerusalem and published not long before his untimely death last December, the book not only illuminates this spiritual giant's ideas in a scholarly fashion, it's also accessible to the general reader's desire to know more about a remarkable 19th-century figure.

With Israel always in the news, and the war in Gaza provoking constant streams of argument and counterargument even now, it's worthwhile to find the time to step back and analyze Judaic perspectives on issues of war, ethics and leadership. One insightful contribution is Law, Politics and Morality in Judaism, edited by Michael Walzer, perhaps the pre-eminent theorist of just war in the world today.

Prof. Walzer's own essay on commanded and permitted wars should be perused by anyone who wishes a sober and reflective understanding of the difficulty of using the Torah to map out current geopolitical strategies. Other essays in this volume address related complexities of Jewish sovereignty.

Students often ask, sometimes with no small measure of patronization, why the Bible is worth their time and attention and whether a modern person should be engaged by a text reflective perhaps of the "prejudices of antiquity." In Created Equal, Rabbi Joshua Berman addresses, with academic deftness, the revolutionary character of the Bible. Berman's reading reveals a book that precipitated a sea change in the history of political thought and laid the groundwork for a radically egalitarian worldview unknown elsewhere in the ancient world.

Many of the critiques levelled against traditional Judaism that are by now de rigeur were anticipated and articulated by philosopher Baruch Spinoza in the early 17th century. A beautifully written account of Spinoza's context, both the world he inherited and the one he left us, is provided by Rebecca Goldstein in Betraying Spinoza. Spinoza's often difficult concepts are rendered lucidly (but not dumbed down) by Goldstein, who also captures in poignant ways Spinoza's own struggle with the Jewish community and the uncompromising rigour with which he pursued his vision of reality.

Reflections on old age

Observations and witticisms about old age are ubiquitous. There is no escaping mortality, but evidently we can talk and laugh about it.

George Burns at 95 was asked what restrictions old age had imposed upon him. He replied: "I don't buy green bananas anymore."

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

Fred Astaire said that old age is like everything else – to make a success at it, you've got to start young.

A Pennsylvania German proverb teaches that if you pull out a grey hair, seven will come to its funeral.

There are a few areas of the world where people are said to live the longest: in the Ecuadorean Andes Mountains, in Hunza Land in the Pakistani Himalayas, and in the Caucasus Mountains of Russia. Residents of these remote areas live in high altitudes, breathe clean and healthy mountain air and engage in vigorous daily exercise.

But the true secret of their longevity includes a positive outlook on life, the ability to deal with stress and emotional upheaval and to benefit from a nurturing and stable extended family. They are made to feel needed, useful, vital and important. But perhaps, most important of all, the secret of their longevity is found in their loving and being loved. They flourish in communities where people really care about one another.

A psychologist at Boston University has done innovative research on the subject of unselfish love. He found that caring for others without concern about benefits for oneself is closely related to good health and longevity.

Hamlet said, while holding in his hands a skull: "To this favour she must come." The reality of our lives is that, as time goes on, if we can't find meaning and value in our later years, we reveal that our earlier years were hollow as well.

What is disheartening for the elderly – like myself – is the passing from the scene of classmates, congregants, colleagues and friends. The ties to the past grow weaker, and the future is a template of dwindling days.

In Oliver Goldsmith's play, She Stoops to Conquer, Hardcastle says to his wife, Dorothy: "I love everything that is old: old friends, old times, old manners, old books, old wine, and I believe, Dorothy, you'll own, I have been pretty fond of an old wife."

Successful aging not only retains the kind of quality that only old books, old wine, old friends can give – it also brings a seasoned wisdom to which the young can not pretend without betraying their youth.

In many ways, it is the old that are to be envied by the young. The old have so much less to lose that often they are capable of much more dedication and commitment to the values, ideals and principles that provide meaning to all our lives.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut concludes his wise and helpful book, The Price and Privilege of Growing Old, with the assurance that we who are old deserve to be seen for who we are: individuals who don't want to spend the rest of our days as society's offal, discarded and delegitimized.

He writes that most of us still have much to give. Rescuing our potential from thoughtless waste and making it available to all will be a common benefit. "The young will learn from the exercise, and the old will acquire self-respect. It is a win-win project."

A sage once taught that a human being is like a letter of the alphabet – to produce a word, it must combine with others. For the lives of the elderly to have meaning, there must be encounter and involvement. Only through such relationships does life display the fullness of its potential for depth and beauty.

18th Maccabiah Games, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In 1912 Yosef Yekutieli, a 15-year-old Russian-born immigrant to Palestine, was so inspired by the Olympic Games in Stockholm that he starting a quest to create a similar event for Jewish athletes. After years of Yekutieli's lobbying, Tel Aviv played host to the first "Maccabiada" in 1932. Next month, 7,000 athletes from more than 50 countries will participate in the 18th Maccabiah Games. [tinyurl.com/maccab01]

Where does the name "Maccabiah" come from? Here are two explanations from the Encyclopedia Judaica.

• The word Maccabi is formed by taking the Hebrew acronym of the words Mi Kamocha Ba'ay-lim Ado-shem! Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? [tinyurl.com/maccab 02]

• It was named after Judah Maccabee, famous for his role in the revolt against the Greeks in the story of Chanukah. [tinyurl.com/maccab12]

Several websites point out an interesting irony – that Judah Maccabee "strongly disapproved of athletic games and competitions, which were a clear influence of Greek culture and were introduced into Jerusalem by his staunch enemies, the Hellenising Jews." [tinyurl.com/maccab04]

That didn't seem to bother Zionist Theodor Herzl, when he exhorted a century ago: "Join together, young men, we need you. Train not only your spirit, but your muscles as well. Be strong and upright and study diligently. We shall need your strength and your knowledge. I believe that a new and wonderful generation of Jews shall arise in the country. The sons of the Maccabees will return to life!" [tinyurl.com/maccab05]

When those first Maccabiah Games took place in Tel Aviv, Mayor Meir Dizengoff made quite the entrance into the stadium astride a white stallion. As well, "the opening ceremony witnessed the release of 120 carrier pigeons, 10 pigeons for each of the 12 tribes of Israel, whose mission was to send to the world news of the opening of the first Maccabiah Games." Those first games welcomed 390 athletes from 18 countries. [tinyurl.com/maccab06]

Here's a great piece of trivia from the second Maccabiah in 1935: "In defiance of the British government's strict limitations on aliyah, many competitors took advantage of their being in the Holy Land and decided to stay. Such was the decision of the entire Bulgarian delegation, which unanimously decided to make aliyah and shipped their musical instruments back to Bulgaria instead of themselves." [tinyurl.com/maccab07]

By 1997, the Maccabiah hosted 5,500 athletes from 50 countries. But the 15th games will always be remembered for the tragedy that caused loss of life and numerous injuries. Four members of the Australian delegation were killed and some 70 others were injured when a footbridge collapsed as they walked over it to attend the opening ceremony. Four of the five officials found guilty of negligence for the bridge collapse were sentenced to prison terms. Australia's participation in the following Maccabiah had been in doubt until Israel agreed to pay $4 million in compensation to Sasha Elterman. The Australian tennis player had been near death after ingesting a poisonous fungus in the polluted waters of the Yarkon River. [tinyurl.com/maccab08]

This year, representatives from Australia were on hand for the dedication of a project aimed to rehabilitate the heavily polluted Yarkon River, the primary cause of the athletes' deaths. [tinyurl.com/maccab09]

Although the Maccabiah may not have the international profile of other sporting events, some athletes appreciate it for the value its founders tried to instil. U.S. swimmer Lenny Krayzelburg won three gold medals in the backstroke at the Sydney Olympics in 2000. Before the 16th Maccabiah in 1991, he made waves when he announced that he planned to skip that year's World Swimming Championships in Japan, just so that he could compete at the Maccabiah. In addition, he said that he plans to work with Jewish and immigrant children. "I may be wrong, but there might be a perception that Jewish kids are not athletic. Maybe I can change that trend." [tinyurl.com/maccab10]

If you've dreamed of competing on the international stage but aren't quite ready for the track, the pool or the rugby pitch, you may still be in luck. The Maccabiah has long featured events that require both brawn and brain. That means you, bridge and chess masters. [tinyurl.com/maccab11]

New IVF program helps Orthodox Jews conceive

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An unusual collaboration between religion and science is making it possible for Orthodox Jews to undergo infertility treatment in Montreal.

The Jewish Community Council of Montreal (Vaad Ha'ir) and the McGill Reproductive Centre, located at the Royal Victoria Hospital, have officially launched a program that strictly adheres to Halachah while offering the latest technology, including in vitro fertilization (IVF).

The program has been a year in development, while the Vaad and the staff of the clinic train a volunteer corps of Orthodox Jewish women observers, who are present at all times when either the egg or sperm of an Orthodox Jew, or the resulting embryo, is exposed. This is to reassure a couple that it is, indeed, their reproductive material that is being used.

While a private infertility clinic offering supervision by observers trained by an institute in Israel was recently opened in Toronto, the McGill Reproductive Centre is the first university-based research institute in Canada to bear a certification from a rabbinical organization.

Previously, Orthodox couples often went to New York or even Israel to find this type of compliance with their beliefs.

The observers are known as mashgichot, a feminized version of the term used for men who supervise the kashrut of food. When on duty, they wear the same gowns, caps and shoe covers as everyone else at the clinic.

When no observer is present, the embryos are kept in one of two locked incubators reserved for the Orthodox program, and the eggs in two designated deep-freeze tanks that are also sealed, which were purchased with private donations from the Jewish community.

Only an observer and an embryologist normally have access to these containers.

The program came about by the coincidental arrival in Montreal from Israel within the past few years of Rabbi Yonason Binyamin Weiss, now chief of the Montreal Beth Din, and Dr. Hananel Holzer, an infertility expert who is in charge of the medical side of the program. He's the only other person who has access to the special incubators and tanks, and then only in case of emergency.

He and the centre's embryologists, who are specialized biologists, trained the observers in the medical aspects of assisted reproduction, while Rabbi Weiss trained them in Jewish law.

There are now eight observers, and another group will start being trained in a couple of weeks because of the demand for the program, Holzer said.

Rabbi Weiss, a Chassid from Bnei Brak, is an authority on the halachic interpretation of medical and bioethical issues. Holzer, an obstetrician and gynecologist, was deputy director of the IVF unit at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem for 12 years, as well as founder and director of a fertility unit in the city of Modi'in, where he had a lot of experience working with haredi communities.

Holzer, who is not Orthodox, worked closely with many of Israel's top rabbis to ensure that treatments met the letter and spirit of Jewish law.

Holzer said that two embryologists always normally witness the handling of any eggs, sperm and embryos. The Vaad-certified observers offer Orthodox patients, for whom lineage is of utmost importance, an extra level of comfort.

The couple is given the name of an observer, whom they make contact with themselves.

All of the staff at the centre have been instructed in Jewish law by Rabbi Weiss, and all may work with the eggs, sperm or embryo of Orthodox patients.

The program appears to be accepted by the even the most religiously rigorous communities in the Montreal area.

Currently, infertility treatment, which can be very expensive, is not fully covered by medicare, but a bill was tabled in April in the National Assembly would make IVF reimbursable.

There are other considerations in treating Orthodox couples for infertility besides providing observers, Holzer said. Due to prohibitions on masturbation and contraception, the only way to obtain a semen sample from the man is to provide him with a special condom with a small hole at the end.

After intercourse, the condom is brought to the clinic. None of the semen is disposed of. After analysis, it's always used in a treatment, thereby conforming to the biblical injunction against "spilling seed in vain," Holzer said.

He also has to work around laws governing when a couple must abstain from intercourse, namely the seven days following the end of a woman's menstrual period. Sometimes, medication is needed to ensure this is respected and that ovulation takes place at the right time.

Due to the strong imperative to have children, Orthodox Jews have generally embraced the new technology, Holzer said, and, in many ways, have a liberal attitude to its possibilities. In Israel, they were among his first patients for IVF.

Success rates for IVF have improved dramatically, he added. "In 1996, only 17 to 20 per cent of IVF treatments resulted in pregnancy. Today, it's up to 60 per cent."

"The Orthodox call me the shaliach [emissary] of God," he said.

Iran will continue its attempts to 'gain legitimacy'

When asked about this, Miller said Dagan's statements were based on Israeli intelligence analyses that indicate "Iran has not gone to all this trouble and confrontation with the international community in order to break out and create an extreme crisis… for the sake of one single bomb. The assessment is that they will expand and broaden their technological and nuclear industrial base and then have the capacity to produce five or more bombs simultaneously. For this they will need a few more years, around 2014."

Until then, he said, Iran will seek to consolidate its power bases around the world and grow ever bolder in its quest to become a global Islamic "superpower."

Miller said Israel is "seeing a change in the [power] balances between regional parties [in the Middle East]. The dividing lines are changing. And Iran plays a dominant role."

Despite the ongoing grassroots protests in Tehran calling for a recount of the June 12 vote, which saw Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad re-elected, Miller said that short of full-fledged regime change – Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khameini and his Guardian Council of Islamic jurists wield the real power in Iran and govern based on their messianic interpretation of the Qur'an – any swap in leadership would be inconsequential, Miller said.

Over the weekend, Khameini threatened to quell the protests by employing the Basij – a militia loyal to the Guardian Council – to attack those calling for the democratization of Iran.

Nineteen protesters were killed Saturday, and ABC reported that 13 were killed Sunday. More than 50 protesters have been killed, although some reports estimate the number to be well over 100. Police in Iran say they have rounded up 170 reformist leaders.

Appearing Sunday on NBC's Meet the Press, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said that while Israel and much of the world support the protesters and want a change in government in Iran, it's most important to prevent the sitting government from developing nuclear weapons.

Miller said Iran will continue its attempts to "gain legitimacy by exporting its radical ideas… of revolutionary terrorism. The president is a figurehead."

He cautioned those in the West who assume Iran is only the Middle East's problem to think again.

Beyond controlling its Hamas and Hezbollah proxies, "Iran today, if you look at Iraq, Afghanistan, Venezuela, Columbia, Africa, Indonesia… plays a role. [And] the Gulf states are very concerned about Iranian domination," he said.

He added that for years, Iran's confidence in its growing power has increased, and if nuclear capability is added to that mix, "you will get an Iran that will feel absolutely unstoppable.

"Iran is a master of delay tactics," Miller said, adding that the longer the world allows it to hold off sanctions and pressure through political gamesmanship, the closer it will get to realizing its goal as a nuclear power.
